THE TROJAN

The Prologue.

A S lately lifting up the leaves of worthy writers works,
Wherein the Noble acts and deeds of many hidden larks,
Our Author he hath found the Glasse of glory shining bright,
Wherein their lues are to be seene, which honour did delight,
To be a Lamborne unto those which dayly do desire,
Apollos Garland by desert, in time for to aspire,
Wherein the froward chances oft, of Fortune you shall see,
Wherein the chearefull countenance, of good successes bee:
Wherein true Lovers findeth ioy, with hugie heapes of care,
Wherein as well as famous facts aggredous placed are:
Wherein the iust reward of both, is manifestly showne,
That vertue from the roote of vice, might openly be knowne.
And doulting nought right Courteous all, in your accustomed woon
And gentle eares, our Author he, is prest to bide the brunt
Of bablers tonges, to whom he thinks, as frustrate all his toile,
As peereles taste to filthy Swine, which in the mire doth moile.
Well, what he hath done for your delight, be gane not me in charge,
The Actors come, who shall expresse the same to you at large.

THE HISTORIE OF Sir Clyomon Knight of the golden Sheeld, son to the King of Denmark: And Clamydes the white Knight, sonne to the King of Swauia.

Enter Clamydes.

Clamydes. As to the wearie wadring wights, whom waltring waves assurc,
No greater ioy of ioyes may be, then when from out the Ocean
They may behold the Altitude of Billowes to abate,
For to obserue the Longitude of Seas in former rate.
And hauing then the latitude of Sea-roome for to passe,
Their ioy is greater through the griefe, then erst before it was.
So likewise I Clamydes, Prince of Swania Noble soyle,
Bringing my Barke to Denmarke here, to bide the bitter broyle:
And beating blowes of Billowes high, while raging stormes did last,
My grieves was greater then mighte be, but tempests ouerpast,
Such gentle calmes ensued hath, as makes my ioyes more
Through terror of the former feare, then erst it was before.
So that I sit in safetie, as Sea-man vnder shrowdes,
When he perceives the stormes be past, through vanquishing of Clowdes.
For why, the doubtfull care that draue me off, in daunger to preuaile,
Is dasht through bearing lesser braine, and keeping vnder saile:
So that I haue through trauell long, at last possest the place
Whereas my Barke in harbour safe, doth pleasures great embrase:
And hath such license limited, as heart can seeme to aske,
To go and come, of custome free, or any oþer taske.

The Historie of Chyomon

I meane by Juliana she, that blaze of bewties breeding,
And for her noble gifts of grace, all other dames exceeding:
Shee hath from bondage set me free, and freed, yet still bound
To her, aboue all other Dames that liues vpon the ground:
For had not she bene mercifull, my ship had rusht on Rocks,
And so decayed amids the stormes, through force of clubbish knocks:
But when she saw the daunger great, where subiect I did stand,
In bringing of my silly Barke, full fraught from out my land,
She like a meeke and modest Dame, what should I else say more?
Did me permit wigh full consent, to land vpon her shore:
Vpon true promise that I would, here faithfull still remaine,
And that performe which she had vowed, for those that should obtaine
Her princely person to possesse, which thing to know I stay,
And then aduenturously for her, to passe vpon my way.
Loe where she comes, ah peereles Dame, my Juliana deare.

Enter Juliana with a white Sheeld.

Juliana. My Clamydes, of troth Sir Prince, to make you stay thus here,
I profer too much iniurie, that's doubtlesse on my part,
But let it no occasion give, to breed within your hart
Mistrust that I should forge or faine, with you my Loue in ought.

Clamy. No Lady, touching you, in me doth lodge no such a thought,
But thankes for your great curtesie that would so friendly heere
In mids of miserie receiue, a forraine straunger meere:
But Lady say, what is your will, that it I may perstand?

Julia. Sir Prince, vpon a vow, who spowfeth me, must needly take in hand
The flying Serpent for to sley, which in the Forrest is,
That of strange manuels beareth name, which Serpent doth not mis
By dayly vse from every coast, that is adyacent there,
To fetch a Virgin maide or wife, or else some Lady faire,
To feed his hungrie panch withall, if case he can them take,
His nature loe it onely is, of women spoyle to make:
Which thing no doubt, did daunt me much, and made me vow indeed,
Who should espouse me for his wife, should bring to me his head:
Whereto my father willingly, did giue his like consent,
Lo Sir Clamydes, now you know what is my whole intent:
And if you will as I haue said, for me this trauell take,
That I am yours, with heart and mind, your full account do make.

Clamy. Ah

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Cla. Ah Lady, if case these travells should surmount, the travells whereby Vnro the worthies of the world, such noble brute and fame, (came
Yea though the dangers shou'd surpassle stout Hercules his toyle,
Who fearing noughe the dogged feend, sterne Serbarus did foyle.
Take here my hand, if life and limbe the liuing Gods do lend,
To purchase thee, the dearest drop of bloud my heart shall spend.
And therefore Lady lincke with me, thy loyall heart for aye,
For I am thine til fates vntwine, of vital life the stay:
Protesting here if Gods assist, the Serpent for to kil.

Ind. Then shalt thou of all women win, the heart and great good wil,
And me possesse for spowfed wife, who in election am
To haue the Crowne of Denmarke here, as heire vnto the same,
For why, no children hath my sire besides me, but one other,
And he indeed is heire before, for that he is my brother.
And Clymon so hight his name, but where he doth remaine,
Vnto my Parents is vnowne, for once he did obtaine
Their good wills for to go abroad, a while to spend his daies,
In purchasing through actiue deeds, both honour, laud and praise,
Whereby he might deserue to haue the ordes of a Knight,
But this omitting vnto thee, Clamydes here I plights.
My faith and troth, if what is said by me thou dost performe.

Clamy. If not, be sure O Lady with my life, I neuer will returne.

Ind. Then as thou seemest in thine attire, a Virgins Knight to be,
Take thou this Sheeld likewise of white, and beare thy name by me,
The white Knight of the Siluer Sheeld, to elevate thy praise.

Clamy. O Lady as your pleasure is, I shall at all assayes Endeuour my good will to win, if Mars do send me might,
Such honour as your grace with ioy, shall welcome home your Knight.

Ind. Then farewell my deare Clamydes, the gods direct thy way,
And graunt that with the Serpents head, behold thy face I may.

Exit.

Clamy. You shall not need to doubt thereof, O faithfull Dame so true,
And humbly kissing here thy hand, I bid thy Grace adue.
Ah happie time and blisfull day, wherein by fate I find
Such friendly fauours as is foode, to feede both heart and mind:
To Shania soile I swiftly will prepare my foot-steps right,

There.

The Historie of Clyomon,

There of my father to receive the order of a Knight:
And afterwards addresse my selfe in hope of honours Crowne,
Both Tyger fell and Monster fierce, by dint for to drive downe.
The flying Serpent soone shall feele, how boldly I dare vaunt me,
And if that Hydra head she had, yet dread should never daunt me.
If murdering Minataure, a man might count this ougly beast,
Yet for to win a Lady such, I do account it least
Of trauels toyle to take in hand, and therefore farewell care,
For hope of honour sends me forth, mongst warlike wights to share.

Exit.

Enter Sir Clyomon Knight of the golden Sheeld, sonne to the King of Denmarke, with subtil Shift the Vice, booted.

Clyo. Come on good fellow follow me, that I may vnderstand
Of whence thou art, thus trauelling here in a forraine land:
Come why dost thou not leaue loytering there, and follow after me?

Shift. Ah I am in ant shall please you.

Clyo. In, why where art thou in?

Shift. Faith in a dyrte Ditch with a woman, so beraide, as it's pittie to see.

Clyo. Wel, I see thou art a merrie cōpanion, I shall like better of thy cōpany:
But I pray thee come away.

Shift. If I get out one of my legs as fast as I may Halo, A my buttocke, the very founation thereof doth breake,
Halo, once againe, I am as fast, as though I had frozen here a weeke.

Here let him slip up to the Stage backwards, as though he had puld his leg out of the mire, one boote off, and rise up to run in againe.

Clyo. Why how now, whither runst thou, art thou foolish in thy minde?

Shift. But to fetch one of my legs ant shall please, that I haue left in the mire behind.

Clyo. One of thy legs, why looke man, both thy legs thou hast,
It is but one of thy bootes thou hast lost, thy labour thou doest wast.

Shift. But one of my bootes, Iesu, I had such a wrench with the fall,
That I assure, I did thinke one of my legs had gone withall.

Clyo. Well let that passe, and tell me what thou art, and what is thy name?
And from whence thou cam'st, and whither thy iourney thou doest frame,
That I haue met thee by the way, thus trauelling in this sort?

Shift. Whas

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Shift. What you haue requested, an that please, I am able to report,
What I am by my nature each wight shall perceiue
That frequenth my company, by the leatring I haue.
I am the sonne of Appollo, and from his high seate I came,
But whither I go, it skils not, for knowledge is my name:
And who so bath knowledge, what neede he to care
Which way the wind blowe, the way to prepare.

Cly. And art thou knowledge, of troth I am glad that I haue met with thee.

Shift. I am knowledge, and haue as good skill in a woman as any man whatsoeuer he beo.

For this I am certaine of, let me but lie with her all night,
And Ile tell you in the morning, whither shē is maide, wife, or spight:
And as for other matter, speaking of langishes, or any other thing,
I am able to serue an that shall please, an that were great Alexander the King.

Cly. Of troth, then for thy excellencies I will thee gladly entartaine,
If in case that with me thou vist promise to remaine.

Shift. Nay an that shall please ye, I am like to a woman, say may and take it,
When a gentleman proffers entertainment, I were a foole to forsake it.

Cly. Well knowledge, then sith thou art content my seruante to bee,
And endued with noble qualities, thy personage I see,
Thou hauing perfect knowledge, how thy selfe to behaue,
I will send thee of mine arrant, but haste thither I crave:
For here I will stay thy comming againe.

Shift. Declare your pleasure sir, and whither I shall go, and then the case is plaine.

Cly. Nay of no great importance, but being here in Sussex
And neare vnto the Court, I would haue thet to take thy way
Thither with all speede, because I would heare
If any shewes or triumphs be towards, else would I not come there,
For onely vpon seates of armes, is all my deight.

Shift. If I had knowne so much before, seruete that seruete will, I would haue seru'd no martiall Knight.
Well sir, to accomfishe your will, to the court I will by,
And what newes is there stirring, bring word by and by.

Exe.

Cly. Do so good knowledge, and here in place thy comming I will stay:

B

The Historie of Chyomon.

For nothing doth delight me more, then to heare of martiall play,
Can foode vnto the hungry corps, be cause of greater ioy,
Then for the haughtie heart to heare, which doth it selfe employ,
Through martiall excercises much to winne the brite of Fame,
Where mates do meeke which ther eyne, their fauors seemes to frame,
Can musike more the penisue heart or daunted mind delight,
Can comfort more the carefull corps and ouer palled sprite,
Reioyce, then sound of Trumpet doth each warlike wight allure,
And Drum and Fyfe vnto the fight doth noble heares procure,
To see in sunder shuered, the Lance that leades the way,
And worthy knights robeauered, in field amidst the fray,
To heare the raling Cannons roare, and Hylts on Helmets ring,
To see the souldiers swarne on heapes, where valiant hearts doth bring
The cowardly crew into the case of carefull Captives band,
Where auncientes braue displayed be, and wonne by force of hand.
What wight would not as well delight as this to heare and see,
Betake himselfe in like affaires a fellow mate to bee,
With Chyomon so Denmarke King the onely sonne and heire.
Who of the Golden Sheeld as now, the knightly name doth beare,
In euery land since that I soyld the worthy Knight of Fame,
Sir Samuel before the King, and Prince of martiall game.
Alexander cald the Great, which when he did behold,
He gave to me in recompence, this Shield of glittering Gold:
Requesting for to know my name, the which shall not be showen
To any Kight, vnlesse by force he make it to be knownen.
For so I vowed to Denmarke King, my fathers grace when I
First got his leauue, that I abroad my force and strength might try.
And so I haue my selfe behau'd, in Cittie, Towne and field,
That never yet did fall reproach, to the Knight of the Golden Shield.

Enter Subtil Shift, running.

Shift. Gods ames, where are you, where are you? and you bee a man
Come away.

Cho. Why what is the matter knowledge to tell thy arrand stay.

Shift. Stay, what talke you of staying, why then all the sight will be past,
Clymides the Kings sonne shall be dub'd Knight in all hast.

Cho. Ah know'edge, then come indeed, and good pastime thou shalt see,
For I will take the honour from him, that dubbed I may bee. Upon

Shift. Leade you the way and ile follow, weele be both made knighes to-
Ah surrah, is my maister so lustie, or dares he be so bold? (gither,
It is no manuell then, if he beare a Sheeld of Gold.
But by your patience, if he continue in this busynesse, farewell maister than,
For I promise you, I entend not very long to be his man:
Although vnder the tytle of knowledge my name I do faine,
Subtil Shift I am called, that is most plaine.
And as it is my name, so it is my nature also,
To play the shifting knave wherefoever I go.
Well, after him I will, but soft now, if my maister chance to be lost.
And any man examine me, in telling his name I am as wise as a post.
What a villaine was I, that ere he went, could not aske his Well, its no great matter, I am but halfe bound, I may serue whom I will yet.

Enter: the Ring of Statute, with the Herald before him.

Clamydes, three Lords.

King. Come Clamydes thou our sonne, thy Fathers talke attend,
Since thou art prest thy youthfull dayes in prowesse for to spend:
And doest of vs the order aske, of knighthood for to haue,
We know thy deeds deserues the same, and that which thou doest craue
Thou shal possesse: but first my sonne, know thou thy fathers charge,
And what to knighthood doth belong, thine honour to enlarge:
Vnto what end a knight is made, that likewise thou maiste know,
And beare the same in mind also, that honour thine may flow
Amongst the worthies of the world, to thy immortall fame:
Know thou therefore, Clamydes deare, to haue a knightly name
Is first aboue all other things his God for to adore,
In truth according to the lawes prescribde to him before.
Secondly, that he be true vnto his Lord and king.
Thirdly, that he keepe his faith and troth in every thing.
And then before all other things that else we can commend,
That he be alwaies ready prest, his countrey to defend:
The Widow poore, and fatherlesse, or Innocente bearing blame,
To see their cause redressed right, a faithfull knight must frame:

1578 Historie of Clymene

In truth he alwaies must be in my shryng
That will receiue a knighthely name, his honour to enlarge.

Cly. O Father, this yong gracious compasell given to me your onely sonnes,
Shall not be in obliuion cast, till my selfe be rympe: A
What way dooth winne Dame Honours Companie, those pathes my steppes
Shall passe, A And thon that aid me summoned to this world to tell
And thon that to reproach my leade, which scheketh me defacemente A True Honour in her Regall case, I shall detell for aye, A
And be as vster enemie, to them bothe knyghts and day to day the knyghts A
By flying force of flickring fame, A Now grace shall understand me A
Of my behauour noble syre, in greate forswaid lande quallish me no A
And if you heare by some reporte yowre selfe in the Battell A And in the field A
Of wilfullnesse contrary this, yong gracie abbie charge me A And in the field A
Let ignomie to my reproach, in stead of lady fame, A And in the field A Sound through the earth and Azure Skies, the strained blast of shame, A Wherby within Oblivions Tombe, my deeds shall be detained, A
Where otherwise of memorie, therond I knyght haue gained A
So that the den of darksomenesse, shall smock my chest, A
Where wroghty deeds, prefers each wight, with honour to be blisst. A

King. Well Clymene, thou knyghte downe, according as it right,
That here thou mayst receyue of me the order of a Knyghte. A

Here let my knyghte armes, Clymon with swerd Shiffe and honyng plate armes, A
And in the honyng plate armes, lay the Mace of his brest for Clymon. A
Take the shiffe and swerd presently, also armes, and set them by me. A

Shift. Now prepare thy selfe, for the bethicher a Knyghte a knyghte. A
Cly. Content thy selfe knyghte, for so quickly bethicher a knyghte A King. The Noble orders of a Knyghte, Clymene vnde these swode shiffe A
We give through due dessest, in these fore see shapeth bee. A
Both Valiant, Wise, and Hardie bethicher, and knyghte A

Shift. Away now quicly, do shew to take shiffe. A

King. Ah stout attempt of Bremen bold, their death from this my sonnes, A
The Knyghte-hondling, my Lands purpose, are furthe can be rympe. A
Therefore him, addring in Shift. A

Knight of the golden Sheld.

Ah Clamydes how art thou best of honour here? who am I that I should be? T
Was like presumption euer seene, that one a straunger meere, s i f i s t, o U
Should come in presence of a Prince, and tempt as he hath done, A
To take the Knight-hood thus away, from him who is his sonne? A

Clamy. Ah father, how am I perplexed, till I revenged be? T
Upon the wretch which here hath taue, the honour that from me? O
Was euer any one deceiu'd of Knight-hood so before? S i f i s t, o U

King. Well Clamydes, my Lords returne, stay till we do know more. O

Enter Shift brought in by the two Lords who pursued

Clyomon. w i n d i s t, o U

1. Lord. O King the knight is fled and gone, pursue preuaileth nought, O
But here his slau we taken haue, to tell why this he wrought. O

King. Ah euell grudge that greeves my ghost, shall he escape me so? O
Shall he with honour from my sonne, without disturbance go? O
Ah Catiffe thou, declare his name, and why he vened here: O
Or death shall be thy guerdon, by all the Gods I swere. O

Shift. Ah lord shall please you, I know neither him, his country nor name, O
2. Lo. What, what sir, are not you his servant? will you denie the Office? O

King. Nay then you are a dissembling knave, I know very well. O

Shift. And shall please your Grace, even the very truth I shall tell, O
I shold haue bene his servant when we met together, s i f i s t, o U
Which was not full three hours before we came hither, s i f i s t, o U

King. Well what is his name, and of what countrey deuotes? s i f i s t, o U

Shift. That cannot I tell, but shall please you, you never had servant in such care: O

To know his Masters name, neither in Towne nor Field, O
And what he was he wold tell but the Knights of the Golden Sheld. O

King. Well Clamydes marke my charge, what I to thee shall say, O
Prepare thy selfe for to pursue that Traitor on his way: O
Which hath thine honour rest from thee, and either by force of hand, O
Or loue, his name and natvie soyle, see that thou understand, O
That I may know for what intent, he bare this grudge to thee, O
Else see thou never doest returne againe to visit me: O
For this imposts him for to be, of valiant heart and mind, O
And therefore do pursue thy spe, until thou doest him find. O

The Historie of Clymyn

To know his name and what he is, or as I said before,
Do neuēr view thy father I, in presence any more.

Clym. Well father, sith it is your charge, and precept giuen to me,
And more for mine owne honours sake, I franckly do agree
To vndeitake the enterprise, his name to vnderstand,
Or neuēr else to shew my face againe in Swēss land.
Wherefore I humbly do desire, the order to receive,
Of Knighthood, which my sole desire hath euer bene to haue:
It is the name and meane, whereby true honour is atchived:
Let me not then O father deare, thereof be now deprived.
Sith that mine honour cowardly was stolne by Caitiffe he,
And not by dinted dastards deed, O father lost by me.

King. Well Clymides, then kneale downe, here in our Nobles sight,
We giue to thee that art our sonne, the order of a Knight:
But as thou wilt our fauour winne, accomplish my desire.

Clym. Else neuēr to your royll Court, O father ile retire.

King. Well, then aduo Clymides deare, the Gods thine ayder be:
But come my Lords, to haue his hire, that Caitiffe bring with me.

Shift. Alas ant shall please you, I am knowledge, and no euill did pretend,
Set me at libertie, it was the knight that did offend.

Cla. O father, sith that he is knowledge, I beseech your grace set him free,
For in these affaires, he shall waite and tend on me:
If he will protest, to be true to me euer.

Shift. Ah Noble Clymides, heeres my hand, ile deceiue you never.

Clym. Wel then father, I beseech your Grace grant that I may haue him.

King. Well Clymides, I am content, sith thou my sonne doest craue him.
Receive him therefore at my hands. My Lords come lets depart.

All. We ready are to waite on you O King, with willing hart.

Exeunt.

Clym. Well knowledge, do prepare thy selfe, for here I do protest,
My fathers preceps to fulfill, no day nor night to rest
From toylsome travell, till I haue reuengd my cause aright,
On him who of the golden Sheeld, now beareth name of knight:
Who of mine honour hath me robd, in such a cowardly sorte,
As for to be of noble heart, it doth him not import.
But knowledge, to me thy seruise shall thou mast with loyall hart professe.

Shift. Vse

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Sibyl. Use me that all other villains may take ensample by me, if I digresse.

Clamy. Well then come follow speedly, that him pursue we may. (Exit.

Sibyl. Keepe you before and shall please you, for I mind not to stay.

Ah sinrah Sibyl, thou wast driven to thy shift now indeed,

I dreame d bfore, that vntowardly I should speed:

And yet it is better lucke then I looked to have:

But as the prouerbe saith, good fortune euer hapneth to the veryest knaue.

And yet I could not escape with my maister, do what I can,

Well by this bargaine he hath lost his new Scriving-man;

But if Clamydes overtake him now, what buffets will there be,

Vnlesse it be foure miles off the fray, there will be no standing for me;

Well after him I will, but howsoeuer my maister speed,

To shifte for my selfe I am fully decreed.

Enter King Alexander the Great, as valiantly set forth as may be,
and as many sondiers as can.

Alex. After many invincible victories, and conquests great and hewed,
I Alexander with sound of Fame, in safetie am arrived.
Vpon my borders long wished for, of Macedonia soile,
And all the world subiect haue, through force of warlike toile,
O Mars I lawd thy sacred name, and for this safe returme,
To Pallas Temple will I wend, and sacrifices burne
To thoe, Bellona and the rest, that warlike wights do guide,
Who for King Alexander did, such good successe prouide.
Who bowes not now vnto my becke, my force who doth not feare?
Who doth not of my conquests great, throughout the world haue?
What King as to his soueraigne Lord, doth now noe bow his knee?
What Prince doth raigne vpon the earth, which yeelds not vnto mee
Due homage for his Regall Mace? What countrey is at libertie?
What Dukedom, Iland, or Prouince else, to me now are not tributarie?
What Fort of Force, or Castle strong, haue I not battered downe?
What Prince is he, that now by me, his Princely seate and Crowne
Doth not acknowledge for to hold, nor one the world throughoue,
But of King Alexander power they all do stand in doubt?
They feare as Fowles that houering flie, from out the Fawcons way,
As Lambe the Lyon, so my power, the stowest do obey.
In field who hath not felt my force, where battering blowes abound?

King.

The Historie of Clymon

King or Keyser, who hath not first his knees to me on ground,
And yet a Alexander, what art thou? thou art a mortall wighte,
For all that ever thou hast got or wonne by force in figh.

I. Lo. Acknowledging thy state o' King, to be as thou hast said,
The Gods no doubt as they haue bene, will be thy sheild and aid
In all attemptes thou takst in hand; if eare no glorie vaine
Thou seekst, but acknowledging thy victories add gaine,
Through the prouidence of sacred Gods so happen vnto thee,
For vaine is trust, that in himselfe man doth repole we see:
And therefore least these victories which thou o' King hast got,
Should blinde thine eyes with arrogancie, thy noble fame to blot,
Let that victorious Prince his words, of Macedon thy fire,
To acknowledge still thy state O King, thy noble heart inspire,
Who after all his victories, triumphantly obtained,
Least that the great felicitie of that which she had gained,
Should daunce him to sunga himselfe; as he did did prouide,
Which came vnto his chamber doore, and every morning cryde
Philip, thou art a mortall man, this practise of thy fire,
Amidst all these thy victories, thy seruants doth deseue,
O Alexander that shewmyle them paine within thy mind,
And then no doubt as father did, shoule place sweete shall find.

Alex. My Lord, yowselfe doublelesse I esteime, and with great thanks agayning offerginge thine, and us, as we are
I do require your countefie, reicting this is plaine,
All vaine glorie from my heart: and since the Gods divine,
To vs above all other Kings, this fortune doth assigne,
To haue in our subiection the world for most part,
We will at this ente houre resumme, with fervent zeale of hast,
In Palme's temple to the gods such sacrifices make,
Of thankfullnesse for our successe, as they in part shall take
The same, a gratulation, sufficiencie from vs feare:
Come then wth vs homewarde to march, to accomplish our intent.

Omes. We redisseate most famous King, to follow thee with victories.

Alex. Then sound yowre Drums and Trumpets both, that we may march triumphantly.

That oda to wold go in to the stede, comynge in to the Englis. Enter gates.

Enter Sir Chyomon, Knight of G. S.

Chyo. Now Chyomon a knight thou art, though some perhaps may say,
Thou cowardly camst to Clamydes, and stole his right away:
No, no, it was no cowardly part, to come in presence of a king,
And in the face of all his Court, to do so worthy a thing.
Amidst the mates that martiall be, and sterne knights of his hall,
To take the knighthood from their Prince, even maunger of them all.
It gives a guerdon of goodwill, to make my glory glaunce,
When warlike wights shall heare thereof, my fame they will aduance:
And where I was pretended late, so Denmarke king my sire,
His royll grace to see, homeward to retire,
Now is my purpose altered by brute of late report,
And where fame resteth to be had, thither Chyomon will resort:
For as I vnderstand by fame, that worthy Prince of mighes,
The conqueror of conquerors, who Alexander hight,
Returning is to Macedon, from many a bloudie broyle,
And there to keepe his royll Court, now after wearey toyle,
Which makes the mind of Chyomon, with joyes to be clad,
For there I know of martiall mates, is company to be had.
Adiu therefore, both Denmarke king and Swans Prince beside,
To Alexanders Court I will, the Gods my iourney guide.

Enter Clamydes and Shift.

Clamy. Come knowledge here he is, nay stay thou cowardly knight,
That like a dastard camst, to stalle away my right.
Chyo. What, what, you raile sir prickocks Prince, me coward for to call.
Shift. Ant shall please you he is a coward, he would haue hynde me,
Amidst your fathers hall.
To haue done it for him, being himselfe in such stay
That scarcely he durst, before your presence appeare.

Chyo. Why how now knowledge, what forlaken thy maister so soone?
Shift. Nay maister was, but not maister is, with you I haue done.
Clamy. Well for what intent camst thou, my honour to stalle away?
Chyo. That I tooke ought from thee, I vtterly denay.
Clamy. Didst not thou take the honour, which my father to me gaue?
Chyo. Of that thou hadst not, I could thes not deprave.
Clamy. Didst not thou take away my knighthood from me?
Chyo. No, for I had it before it was giuen vnto thee:

C

And

The Historie of Chyomon

*And having it before thee, what Argument canst thou make,
That ever from thee the same I did take?*

*Shift. Thats true, he receu'd the blow before at you it came,
And therefore he tooke it not from you, because you had not the same.*

*Clamy. Well, what hight thy name, let me that vnderstand,
And wherefore thou trauailedst here in my fathers land
So boldly to attempte in his Court such a thing?*

*Cho. The bolder the attempte is, more fame it doth bring:
But what my name is desir'est thou to know?*

Shift. Nay he hath stolen sheepe I thinke, for he is ashamed his name for to show.

Clamy. What thy name is, I would gladly perstand:

*Cho. Nay that shall never none know, vnlesse by force of hand
He vanquish me in fight, such a vow haue I made,
And therefore to combat with me, thy selfe do perswade,
If thou wilst know my name.*

Clamy. Well, I accord to the same.

*Shift. Nay then God be with you, if you be at that poynt I am gone.
If you be of the fighters disposition, ile leaue you alone.*

Clamy. Why stay knowldge, although I fight, thou shalt not be molested.

Shift. Ant shall please you, this feare hast made me beray my selfe, with a Proynstone that was not digested.

*Cho. Well Clamy des stay thy selfe, and make my sayings here:
And do not thinke I speake this same, for that thy force I feare,
But that more honour may redound, vnto the victors part,
Wilt thou here give thy hand to me, withouten fraud of hart
Vpon the faith which to a knight doth rightly appertaine,
And by the loyaltie of a knight, ile sweare to thee againe,
For to obserue my promise rust, which is if thou agree,
The fifteenth day next following, to meete Sir Prince with mee,
Before King Alexanders grace, in Macedonia soyle,
Who all the world subiect hath, through force of warlike toyle:
For hee is chiche of chivaltrie, and king of Martiall mates,
And to his roiall Court thou knowest, repaire all estates.
Give me thy hand vpon thy faith, of promise not to faile,
And here is mine to thee againe, if Fortunes froward gaile,*

Resist

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Resist me not, the day forespoke to meete sir Prince with thee,
Before that king to try our strengths, say if thou doest agree,
For try ple honour will it be to him that gets the victorie,
Before so worthy a Prince as he, and Nobles all so publikely,
Where otherwise if in this place we should attempt the same,
Of the honour that were got thereby, but small would be the fame.

Clamy. Well Sir knight, here is my hand, ile meete in place forespoke.

Clyo. And by the loyaltie of a knight, ile not my words resoke.

Clamy. Till then adieu, ile keepe my day.

Exit.

Clamy. And I, if fates do not gainfay.

Shift. What is he gone, and did take no leave of me?
Iesu so vnmannerly a Gentleman did any man see,
But now my Lord which way will you trauell declare?

Clamy. Sith I haue fifteene dayes respit my selfe to prepare,
My Ladies charge for to fulfill, behold I do entend.

Shift. Your Lady ant shall please you, why who is your Lady, may a man be so bold as aske and not offend?

Clamy. Juliana daugheer to the King of Denmarke loe is she,
Whose knight I am, and from her hands this shield was given to me,
In signe and token of good will, whose noble grace to gaine,
I haue protested in her cause for to omis no paine
Nor trauai'e, till I haue subdued the flying Serpents force,
Which in the Forrest of Maruels is, who taketh no remorte
Of wome' kind, but doth deuoure all such as are a stray,
So that no one dares go abroad, nor wander forth the way.
And sith I haue yet fifteene dayes, my selfe for to prepare,
To meete the Knight of the Golden Shield, my heart is voyd of care.
I will vnto the Forrest wend, sith it is in my way,
And for my Julianas sake, that cruell Serpent slay.

Shift. What are you a mad man, will you wilfully be slaine?
If you go into that Forrest, you will never come out againe.

Clamy. Why so knowledge, dost thou thinke the Serpent I feare?

Shift. No, but do you not know of Bryans sance foy, the champion dwells there

Clamy. A cowardly knight knowlidge is he, and dares fighthe with no man.

The Historie of Clyomon

Shift. Ah a noble match, couple him and me together than:
Yea, but although he dares not fight, and Enchanter he is,
And whosoeuer comes in that Forrest, to enchant he doth not mis.

Clamy. Tush, tush, I feare him not knowledge, and therefore come away.

Exit.

Shift. Well seeing you are so wilfull, go you before Ile not stay.
Ah sirtah, now I know all my maisters mind, the which I did not before,
He aduentureth for a Lady, well I say no more:
But to escape the enchantments of Bryan Sance foy,
Thats Bryan without faith, I haue deuise a noble toy:
For he and I am both of one consanguinitie,
The veryest cowardly villaine that euer was borne, thots of a certaintie.
Ile fight with no man, no more will Bryan, thots plaine:
But by his enchantments, he putteth many to great paine.
And in a Forrest of strange marvels doth he keepe,
Altogether by enchantments to bring men a sleepe,
Till he haue wrought his will of them, to Bryan straight will I,
And of my maisters comming to the Forrest informe him priuily,
So shall I win his fauour, and subtil Shift in the end,
Thou shalt escape his enchantment, for he will be thy frend:
Well vnknowne to my maister, for mine owne safegard this will I do,
And now like a subtil shifting knaue, after him ile go.

Exit.

Enter Bryan sance foy.

Bry. Of Brian sance foy who hath not heard? not for his valiant acts,
But well I know throughout the world, doth ring his cowardly facts,
What tho I pray, all are not borne to be God Mars his men,
To toy with daidie dames in cours, should be no copesmates then.
If all were given to chivalrie, then Venus might go weepe,
For any Court in Venetie, that sh: were like to keepe.
But shall I frame then mine excuse, by seruyn Venus she,
When I am knowne throughout the world, faint hearted for to be?
No, no, alas, it will not serue, for many a knight in loue,
Most valiant hearts no doubt they haue, and knightly prowesse proue,
To get their Ladies loyall hearts, but I in Venus yoke,
Am forst for want of valiancie, my freedome to prouoke:
Bearing the name and port of knight, enchantments for to vse,

Wherewith

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Wherewith full many a worthy wight, most cowardly I abuse :
As witnesseth the number now, which in my Castle lye,
Who if they were at libertie, in armes I durst not try.
The feeblest there though he vnarm'd, so is my courage danted,
When as I see the glittering armes, whereby each Knighe is wanted.
But how I vanquish these same Knights, is wonderfull to see,
And Knights that ventured for her loue, whom I do loue they bee.
Thats Insana, daughter to the King of Denmarks grace,
Whose beautie is the cause that I do haue or keepe this place.
For that no wight may her possesse, vnlesse by vow decreed,
He bring and do present to her the flying Serpents head.
Which many hath attempte to do, but none yet could him slay,
Ne afterward hence backe againe, for me could passe away :
For that through my enchantments lo, which heere this forrest keepe,
So soone as I did looke on them, they straight were in a sleepe.
Then presently I them vnarm'd, and to my Castle brought,
And there in prison they do lye, not knowing what was wrought.
Lo thus I range the woods to see who doth the Serpent slay,
That by enchantment I may take the head from him away :
And it present vnto the Dame, as though I were her Knight,
Well heere comes one, ile shrowd my selfe, for sure I will not fight.

Enter Subtil Shift. (sancefay?)

Shift. Gogs bloud where might I meete with that cowardly knave Bryan
I could tell him such a tale now as would make his hart leape for ioy.
Well yonder I haue espied one, whatsoeuer he be.

Bryan. Nay gogs bloud ile be gone, ile shrowd not fighte with me,
But by enchantment ile be even with him by and by.

Shift. A ant shall please you, ile fight with no man, never come so nye.

Bryan. Why what art thou declare ? whither doost thou run ? (the sun.

Shift. Euen the cowardly est villaine ant shall please you that lives vnder

Bryan. What of my fraternitie, doest thou not know Bryan sancefay ?

Shift. What maister Bryan, Iesu how my hart doth leape for ioy
That I haue met with you, who euer had better lucke ?

Bryan. But touch me not.

Shift. Wherfore ?

Bryan. A leſt you enchant me into the likenesse of a bucke.

The Historie of Clyomon

Shift. Tush, tush, I warrant thee, but what art thou declare?

Bryan. Knowledge and it shall please you, who hitherto doth repaire
To tell you good newes.

Shift. Good newes? what are they knowledge expresse?

Bryan. A Knight hath slaine the flying Serpent.

Shift. Tush it is not so.

Bryan. It is most true that I do confesse.

Shift. Ah what hight his name Knowledge? let me that vnderstand.

Clamydes the White Knight, sonne to the King of Swania land,
Who for Juliana, daughter to the King of Denmarkes grace,
Did take the attempt in hand, now you know the whole case.

Bryan. Ah happy newes of gladsomnesse vnto my danted mind,
Now for to winne my Ladys loue, good fortune is affignd:
For though she be Clamydes, right wonne worthely indeed,
Yet will I sure possesse that Dame, by giuing of the head.
But Knowledge where about declare, doeth that Clamydes rest?

Shift. Euen hard by in the Forrest heere where he slew the beast
I left him, and to seeke you did hye:
But let vs go furder into the woods, you shall meeete him by and by.

Bryan. Well Knowledge for thy paines take this as some reward,
And if thou wilt abide with me, be sure ile thee regard
Aboue all others of my men, besides ile giue to thee
A thing, that from enchantments aye, preserued shalt thou be.

Shift. Then here is my hand, ile be your seruante euer:

Bryan. And seeing thou art a coward as well as I, ile forsake thee never.
But come let vs go Clamydes to meeete.

Exeunt.

Shift. Keepe on your way and ile follow, I trust if he meeete him, heele take him to his feete.

Goggs bloud was euer seene such a iolt-headed villaine as he,
To be so afraid of such a faint-hart knaue as I am to see?
Of the fraternitie quoth you? but lady its a notable brood:
Well Shift these chinks doeth thy hart sounre good:
And ile close with Bryan till I haue gotten the thing
That he hath promised me, and then ile be with him to bring.
Well, such shifting knaues as I am, the ambodexter must play,

And

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

And for commoditie serue euery man, whatsoeuer the world say.
Well after Bryan I will, and close with him awhile,
But as well as Clamydes, in the end ile him begile.

Enter Clamydes, with the head upon his sword.

Clamy. Ah happy day my deadly foe submitted hath to death,
Lo heere the hand, lo heere the sword that stope the vitall breath :
Lo heere the head that shall possesse my Indianaes deare,
The Knight of the golden Sheeld his force, what neede I now to feare :
Since I by force subdued haue this Serpent fierce of myght,
Who vanquisht hath as I haue heard, full many a worthie Knighe.
Which for to winne my Ladys loue, their liues haue venterd heere,
Besides that cowardly Bryan which the faithlesse shield doth beare :
A number keepes as I haue heard, as captiues in his hold,
Whome he hath by inchantment got, and not through courage bold.
Shall such defamed dastards, dard by Knights, thus beare their name ?
Shall such as are without all faith, liue to impaire our fame ?
Shall valiant harts by cowardly charme, be kept in captiues thrall ?
Shall Knights liue subiect to a wretch which hath no hart at all ?
Nay first Clamydes claime to thee fell Atrapos his stroke,
Ere thou doest see such worthy Knights to beare the heauie yoke,
Of cowardly Bryan withoute faith, his charmes let daunt not thee,
And for his force thou needst not feare, the Gods thy shield will be.
Well, to meeete the Knight of the golden Shield, yet ten daies space I haue,
And to set free these worthy Knights, but rest a while I craue.
Heere in this place neere to this fort, for that I weary am
With trauell, since from killing of the Serpent late I came : Heere let him
Lo heere a while I mind to rest, and Bryan then subdue, set downe and
And then to Alexanders court, to keepe my promise true. rest himselfe.

Enter Bryan sance foy, and Shift.

Bryan. Come Knowledge, for here he lyes layd weary on the ground :

Shift. Nay, ile not come in his sight, if you would giue me a thousand
For he is the terriblest Knight of any you haue heard spoke, (pound.)
Heele beate a hundred such as you and I am downe at one stroke.

Bryan. Tush, feare thou naught at al, I haue charmed him, and he is fast Lying neere vnto the Castle here which I do keepe. (asleepe,
And ten dayes in this sleepe I haue chariu'd him to remaine,

Before

The Historie of Clyomon

Before nature shall overcome it, that he might wake againe.

In the meane season, lo behold the Serpents head ile take away,
His shield and his apparell, this done, then will I conuay
His body into prison, with other his companions to lye,
Whose strengths, ab knowledge, I durst never attempt to try.

Sbift. Ah handle him softly, or else you wil cause him to awake:

Bryan. Tush, tush, not if all the noyse in the world I were able to make,
Till ten dayes be expired, the charme will not leau him,
And then I am sure he will maruell who did thus deceue him:
So now he is stripped, stay thou here for a season,
And ile go fetch two of my seruants to cary him into prison.

Exit.

Sbift. Well do so maister Bryan, and for your comming ile stay,
Gogs bloud what a villaine am I my maister to betray.
Nay sure ile awake him if it be possible ere they carry him to iayle:
Maister, what maister, awake man, what maister, ah it will not preuaile.
Am not I worthie to be hangd, was euer seene such a deceitfull knaue?
What villany was in me, when vnto Bryan vnderstanding I gaue
Of my maisters being in this forrest, but much I muse indeed
What he meanes to do with my maisters apparell, his shield and the heads
Well, seeing it is through my villany, my maister is at this drift,
Yet when he is in prison, Sbift shall not be voide of a shifte
To get him away, but if it euer come to his eare
That I was the occasion of it, heele hang me thats cleare.
Well heere comes Bryan, ile cloke with him if I may,
To haue the keeping of my maister in prison night and day.

• Enter Bryan lance foy, two seruants.

Bryan. Come sirs take vp this body, and cary it into the appointed place,
And there let it lye, for as yet he shall sleepe ten dayes space.

Sbift. How say you maister Bryan, shall I of him haue the gard?

Bryan. By my troth policie, thy good will to reward

In hope of thy iust seruice, contente I agree

Cary him out.

For to resigne the keeping of this same Knight vnto thee.

But give me thy hand that thou wile deceiue me never:

Sbift. Heres my hand, charme, enchant, make a spider catcher of me, if I be false to you euer.

Bryan. Well

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Bryas. Well then come follow after me, and the gud of him thou shal haue.

Exit.

Shift. A thousand thanks I give you, this is all the promotional cruce:
Ah sirrah, little knowes Bryas, that Clymydes my maister is,
But to set him free from prison I intend not to miss
Yet still in my mind, I can do no other but muse,
What practise with my maisters apparell and shell he will vse:
Well, seeing I haue played the craftie knave with the one, ille play it with the other:
Subtil Shift for aduantage, will deceiue his owne brother.

Exit.

Here let them make a noyse as though they were Marriners.

And after Clyomon Knight of G. S.

come in with me.

Cho. Ah set me to shone sirs, in what countrey so euer we bee.
Shiftmai. Well hayle out the Cockboate, seeing so sickle we do him see,
Strike sayle, cast Ankers, till we haue rigd our Ship againe,
For neuer were we in such stormes before, that's plane.

Enter Clyomon, Boateswaine.

Cho. Ah Boateswaine, gramecie for thy setting me to shone.

Boateswaine. Truly Gentleman we were never in the like tempests before.

Cho. What countrey is this wherein now we be?

Boates. Sure the Isle of Strange Marshes, as our maister told to me.

Cho. How far is it from Macedonia, canst thou declare?

Boates. More then twentie dayes layling, and if the weather were faire.

Cho. Ah cruell hap of Fortunes spire, which signed this luck to me:

What Pallace Boateswaine is this same, canst thou declare, we see?

Boates. That King Patranus keepes his Court, so farre as I do gesse,
And by this traine of Ladyes heere, I sure can iudge no lesse.

Exit.

Cho. Well Boateswaine, theres for thy paines, and here vpon the shone
Ille lie to rest my wearie bones, of thee I craue no more.

Enter Neronis daughter to Patranus, King of the strange Marshes, two Lords, two Ladies.

Neronis. My Lords, come will it please you walk abroad to take the pleasant ayre?

D

According

The Historie of Clyomon

According to our wonted vse, in fields both fresh and faire,

• My Ladies here I know right well, will not gainsay the same.

1. Lord. Nor we sure for to pleasure you, Neronis noble Dame.

Nero. Yes yes, men they loue intreatie much, before they will be wonne,

2. Lo. No Princes that hath womens natures beene, since first the world begunne.

Nero. So you say.

1. Lo. We boldly may,

Vnder correction of your grace.

Nero. Well, will it please you forth to trace,

That when we haue of fragrant fields, the dulcet fumes obtained;

We may vnto the Sea side go, whereas is to be gained,

More straunger sights among Neptunes waues, in seeing Ships to saile,

Which passe here by my fathers shore, with merrie westerne gaile.

1. Lo. We shall your highnesse leade the way to fields, erst spoke before.

Nero. Do so, and as we do retorne weele come hard by the shore.

Exeunt.

Cho. What greater grieve can grow to gripe, the heart of greeued wight,
Then thus to see fell Fortune she, to hold his state in spight.

Ah cruell chance, ah lucklesse lot, to me poore wretch assign'd,
Was euer scene such contraries, by fraudulent Goddess blind.

To any one saue onely I, imparted for to be,

To animate the mind of any man, did euer Fortune she

Showe forth her selfe so ciuell bent, as thus to keepe me backe,

From pointed place by weather driven, my sorrowes more to sacke.

Ah fatal shap, herein a's, what furder shall I say?

Since I am forced for to breake, mine oath and pointed day.

Before King Alexanders gracie, Clamydes will be there:

And I through Fortunes cruell spight, opprest with sicknesse here:

For now within two dayes it is that we should meeete togither,

Woe wotch the wind and raging stormes, alas that brought me hither,

Now will Clamydes me accuse, a f'ithlesse knight to be,

Andeke report, that cowardinesse did dant the heart of me.

The worthy praise that I haue wonne, through f'ame shall be defaced,

The name of the Knight of the Golden Sheeld, alas shall be defaced:

Before that noble Prince of might, wheras Clamydes he

Will

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Will shewe himselfe in Combat wise, for to exclaime on me,
For breaking of my poynted day, and Chyomon to thy greese,
Now art thou in a countrey strange, cleane voyd of all releefe:
Opprest with sicknesse through the rage of stormie blasts and cold,
Ah death come with thy direfull Mace, for longer to vnsold
My sorrowes here it booteth not yet Chyomon do stay,
The Ladies loe, comes towards thee, that walke the other way.

Enter Neronis, two Lords, two Ladies.

Nero. Come faire dames, sith that we haue in fragrant fields obtained,
Of dulcet flowers the pleasant smell, and that these knyghts disdained
Not to beare vs company, our walke more large to make,
Here by the sea of surging waues, our home returne weele make.
My Lords therefore do keepe your way.

1. Lo. As it please your grace, we shall obey,
But behold Madame, what wofull wight, here in our way before,
As seemeth very sicke to me, doth lie vpon the shore.

Nero. My Lords, lets know the cause of greese, whereof he is oppressed:
That if he be a knyght, it may by some meanes be redressed.
Faire sir well met, why lie you here? what is your cause of griefe?

Chy. O Lady, sicknesse by the Sea, hath me opprest in briefe.

Nero. Of truth my Lords, his countenance bewrayes him for to bee,
In health, of valiant heart and mind, and eke of hye degree.

2. Lo. It doth no lesse then so import, O Princes as you say.

Nero. Of whence are you? or what's your name? you wander forth this way.

Chy. Offsmall value O Lady faire, alas my name it is,
And for not telling of the same, hath brought me vnto this.

Nero. Why, for what cause sir Knight, shuld you not expresse your name?

Chy. Because O Lady I haue vowed, contrary to the same.
But where I trauell Lady faire, in Citie, Towne or field,

I am called, and do beare by name, the knight of the Golden Shield.

Nero. Are you that knight of the Goldē sheeld, of whom such fame doth goe?

Chy. I am that selfesame knight faire dame, as here my Sheeld doth shew.

Nero. Ah worthy then of helpe indeed, my Lords assist I pray,
And to my lodging in the court, see that you him convey,

The Historie of Chyomon

For certainly within my minde, his state is much deplored,
But do dispaire in nought sir knight, for you shall be restored,
If Phisicke may your grecce redresse, for I Neronis loe,
Daughter to Patranus king, for that which same doth shooe,
Vpon your acts, will be your friend, as after you shall proue.

I. Lo. In doing so, you shall haue need of mightie loue aboue.

Chy. O Princes, if I ever be to health restord againe,
Your faithfull seruant day and night, I vow here to remaine.

Nero. Well my Lords, come after me, do bring him I require:

Ambo. We shall O Princes willingly accomplish your desire.

Exeunt.

Enter Bryan sance foy, having Clamydes his apparell on his Sheeld, and the Serpents head.

Bry. Ah sirrah, now is the ten dayes full expired, wherein Clamydes he,
Shall wake out of his charmed sleepe, as shortly you shall see:
But here I haue what I desired, his Sheeld, his coat and head,
To Denmarke will I straight prepare, and there present with speed,
The same to Juliana grace, as in Clamydes name,
Whereby I am assur'd, I shall enioy that noble Dame.
For why Clamydes he is safe, for ever being free,
And vnto knowledge is he left, here garded for to bee:
But no man knowes of my pretence, ne whither I am gone,
For secretly from Castle I, haue stolne this night alone
In this order as you see, in the attire of a noble knight,
But yet poore Bryan, still thy heart holds courage in despight.
Well, yet the old prouerbe to disproue, I purpose to begin,
Which alwayes sayth, that cowardly hearts, faire Ladies neuer win.
Shall I not Juliana win, and who hath a cowardlyer hart,
Yet for to brag and boast it out, ile will none take my part.
For I can looke both grim and fierce, as though I were of might,
And yet three Frogs out of a bush, my heart did so affright,
That I fel dead almost therewith, well, cowardly as I am,
Farewell Forrest, for now I will in knight Clamydes name,
To Denmarke to present this head, to Juliana bright,
Who shal haue cowardly dastard wed, in steed of a worthy knight.

Exit.

Enter

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Enter Shift with sword and target.

Shift. Be your leaue I came vp so early this morning that I cannot see my way,

I am sure its scarce yet in the breake of the day.

But you muse I am sure wherefore these weapons I bring,

Well, listen vnto my tale, and you shall know every thing.

Because I played the shifring knaue, to saue my selfe from harme,

And by my procurement, my master was brought in this charme.

The ten dayes are expir'd, and this morning he shall awake,

And now like a craftie knaue, to the prison my way will I take,

With these same weapons, as though I would fight to set him free,

Which will give occasion that he shall mistrust, there was no deceit in mee.

And hauing the charge of him, here vnder Bryans sance for,

I'll open the prison doores, and make as though I did employ

To do it by force, through good will, and onely for his sake,

Then shall Clamydes being at hberity, the weapons of me take,

And set vpon Bryan and all his men, now that they are a sleepe,

And so be reuenged, for that he did him keepe

By charme in this order, so shall they both deceived be,

And yet vpon neither part mistrust towards me.

Well, neere to the prison ile draw, to see if he be awake,

Harke, harke, this same is he, that his lamentation doth make.

Clamydes Ah fatall hap, where am I wretch, in what distressed eace, in prison. Bereft of Tyro, head and sheeld, not knowing in what place:

My body is, ah heavenly gods, was ere such strangenes seenest

What do I dreame? or am I still within the forrest greene?

Dreame? no, no, alas I dreame not I, my senses all do faile,

The strangenes of this cruell hap, doth make my hart to quail.

Clamydes ah by fortune she, what froward luck and fate

Most cruelly assynded is, vnto thy noble state.

Where should I be, or in what place hath destiny assynd?

My sely corps for want of foode and comfort to be pind.

Ah farewell hope of purchasing my lady, since is lost,

The Serpents head whereby I shold pullele that iewell most.

Ah farewell hope of honour eke, now shall I breake my day

Before king Alexanders grace, whereon my faith doth stay.

The Historie of Clyomon

And shall I be found a faithlesse Knight, fye on fell fortune she,
Which hath her wheele of froward chance, thus whirled back on me.
Ah farewell King of Swania land, ah farewell Denmarke dame,
Farewell thou Knight of the golden Sheeld, to thee shall rest all fame.
To me this direfull desteny, to thee I know renoune,
To me the blast of ignomy, to thee dame honours crowne.
Ah hatefull hap, what shall I say, I see the gods hath signed
Through cruelty my carefull corps, in prison to be pined.
And noughe alas amates me so, but that I know not where I am,
Nor how into this dolefull place my wofull body came.

Shift. Alas good Clamydes, in what an admiration is he,
Not knowing in what place his body should be.

Clamy. Who nameth poore Clamydes there? reply to him againe,

Shift. Ant shall please you I am your servant Knowledge, which in a thousand woes for you remaine.

Clamy. Ah Knowledge where am I declare and be briefe.

Shift. Where are you? faith even in the Castle of that false cheefe
Bryans sance foy, against whome to fight and set you free,
Looke out at the windowe, behold I haue brought tooles with mee.

Clamy. Ah Knowledge, then cowardly that caitife did me charme,

Shift. Yea, or else he could never have done you any harme.
But be of good cheere, for such a shift I haue made,
That the keyes of the prison I haue got, your selfe perswade:
Wherewith this morning I am come to set you free,
And as they lye in their beds, you may murder Bryan and his men, and set all other at libertie.

Clamy. Ah Knowledge, this hath me bound to be thy friend for euer:

Shift. A true servant you may see will deceiue his maister never.

So the doores are open, now come and follow after me. Enter out.

Clamy. Ah heauens, in what case my selfe do I see:

But speake Knowledge, canst thou tell how long haue I bene heere?

Shift. These ten dayes full, and sleeping still, this sentence is most cleere.

Clamy. Alas, then this same is the day the which appointed was
By the Knight of the golden Sheeld to me, that combat ours should passe
Before king Alexander's grace, and there I know he is,
Ah ciuell Fortune why shouldst thou thus wrest my chance amis:

Knowing

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Knowing I do but honour seeke, and thou doest me defame,
In that contrary mine exspect, thou all things seekest to frame.
The faith and loyaltie of a knight thou causest me to breake,
Ah hatefull dame, why shouldst thou thus thy fury on me wraue.
Now will king Alexander judge the thing in me to bee,
The which since first I armes could beare, no wight did euer see.
But knowledge giue from thee to me, those weapons that I may Vpon that Bryan be reveng'd, which cowardly did betray
Me of my things, and heere from thrall all other knights set free,
Whome he by charme did bring in bale, as erst he did by mee.
Come, into his lodging will I go, and challenge him and his. Exit.

Shift. Do so, and to follow I will not mis.
Ah serra, here was a shift according to my nature and condition,
And a thousand shifts more I haue, to put my selfe out of suspition.
But it doth me good to thinke how that cowardly knaue Bryansance shal
Shall be taken in the snare, my hart doth euen leape for ioy.
Harke, harke, my maister is amongst them, but let him shifft as he can,
For not to deale with a dog, he shall haue help of his man. Exiit.

Enter after a little fight within, Clamy des bres Knights.
Clamy. Come, come sir Knights, for so vnfortunate was never none as I,
That I should ioy that is my ioy, the heauens themselves deny,
That cowardly wretch that kept you here, and did me so deceiue,
Is fled away and hath the Sheeld, the which my Lady gaue
To me in token of her loue, the Serpents head like caske,
For which this mine aduenture was, to winne her noble grace.

I Knight. And sure that same th'occasion was, why we aduentred hether.
Clamy. Well, sith I haue you delivered, when as you please together
Each one into his native soile his iourney do prepare,
For though that I haue broke my day as erst I did declare,
Through this most cowardly catifes charmes, in meeting of the Knight,
Which of the golden Sheeld beares name, to know else what he hight;
I will to Alexanders court, and if that thence he be,
Yet will I seeke to finde him out, least he impute to me
Some cause of cowardinesse to be, and therefore sir Knights depart,
As to my selfe I wish to you with seruent zeale of hart:
Yet if that any one of you do mette this Knight by way

What

The Historie of Clyomon

What was the cause of this my let, let him perstand I pray.

Omnis. We shall not misle 6 noble Knight, to accomplish this your will.

Exeunt.

Clamy. Well then adue sir Knights each one, the gods protect you still.
What knowledge ho, where art thou man ? come forth that hence we may.

Sbift within. Where am I ? faith breaking open of chests here within, for ile haue the spoile of all away.

Clamy. Tush, tush, I pray thee come that hence we may, no riches thou shalt lacke.

Sbift with a bag as I come now with as much money as I am able to carry it were full of gold of my backe.

on his backe. A there was never poore asse so loden, but how now, that cowardly Bryan haue you slaine ?

And your Shieeld, the Serpents head, and coate, haue you againe ?

Clamy. Ah no knowledge, the knights that here were captiues kept,
they are by me at libertie,

But that false Bryan this same night, is fled away for certaintie.

And hath all things he tooke from me, conuayed where none doth know.

Sbift. O the bones of me, how will you then do for the Serpents head to Indigne to show ?

Clamy. I haue no other hope alas, but onely that her grace
Will credite give vnto my words, when as I shew my case
How they were lost, but first ere I vnto that dame returne,
Ile seeke the knight of the golden Shieeld, whereas he doth sojourne,
To accomplish what my father wold, and therefore come away. Exit.

Sbift. Well, keepe on before, for I mind not to stay.
A serra, the craftier knaue, the better lucke, thats plaine,
I haue such a deale of substance here, where Bryans men are slaine,
That it passeth. O that I had while for to stay,
I could inde a hundredth carts full of kitching stuffe away.
Well, its not best to tary too long behinde, lest my maister ouer-go,
And then some knaue knowing of my money, a pecc of felonage sho. Exit.

Enter Neronis.

Neronis. How can that tree but withered be
That wanteth sap to moist the roote ?

How

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

How can that Vine but waste and pine,
Whose plants are troden vnder foote?
How can that spray but soone decay,
That is with wild weeds ouergrown?
How can that wight in oughe delight
Which shewes, and hath no good will shown?
Or else how can that heart alasse,
But die by whom each ioy doth passe?
Neronis, ah I am the Tree, which wanteth sap to moyst the roote.
Neronis, ah I am the vine, whose Plants are troden vnder foote.
I am the spray which doth decay, and is with wild weeds ouergrown,
I am the wight without delight, which shewes, and hath no good will shown.
Mine is the heart by whom alas, each pleasant ioy doth passe,
Mine is the heart which vades away, as doth the flower or grasse.
In wanting sap to moyst the roote, is ioyes that made me glad,
And plants being troden vnder foote, is pleasures that was had.
I am the spray which doth decay, whom cares haue ouergowne,
But stay Neronis, thou saist thou shwest, and hath no good will shown:
Why so I do, how can I tell, Neronis force no cructie
Thou feest thy knight endued is, with all good gifts of courtesie:
And doth Neronis loue indeed, to whom loue doth she yeeld,
Euen to that noble brute of fame, the knight of the golden Sheeld.
Ah wofull Dame, thou knowest not thou, of what degree he is,
Of noble bloud his gesters shewe, I am assured of this.
Why belike he is some runnagate that will not shew his name,
Ah why should I this allegate, he is of noble fame.
Why dost thou not expresse thy loue, to him Neronis then?
Because shamefastnesse and womanhod, bids vs not seeke to men.
Ah carefull Dame loe thus I stand, as twere one in a trance,
And lacketh boldnesse for to speake, which should my words aduance.
The knight of the Golden Sheeld it is, to whom a thrall I am,
Whom I to health restored haue, since that to court he cam.
And now he is prest to passe againe, vpon his wearie way,
Unto the Court of Alexander, yet hath he broke his day,
As he to me the whole exprest, ah sight that doth me grecue,
Loe where he comes to passe away, of me to take his leave.

The Historie of Clyomon

Enter Clyomon.

Clyo. Who hath more cause to praise the Gods, then I whose state deplored?

Through phisicke and Neronis helpe, to health am now restored:
Whose feruent thrall I am become, yet urgent causes dooth
Constraine me for to keepe it close, and noe to put in prooфе
What I might do to winne her loue, as first my oath and vow,
In keeping of my name vnowne, which she will not allow,
If I shuld seeme to breake my minde, being a Princes borne,
To yeld her loue to one vknowne, I know sheele thinke it scorne:
Besides here longer in this Court, alas, I may not stay,
Although that with Clymdes he, I haue not kept my day:
Least this he should suppose in me, for cowardlinesse of hart,
To seeke him out elsewhere, I will from out this Land depart.
Yet though vnto Neronis she, I may not shew my mind,
A faithfull heart when I am gone, with her I leaue behind.
Whose bountiousnesse I here haue felt, but since I may not stay,
I will to take my leaue of her, before I passe away.

Loe where she walkes, O Princesse well met, why are you here so sad?

Nero. Good cause I haue, since pleasures passe, the whiche shuld make me glad.

Clyo. What you should meane, O Princesse deare, hereby I do not know.

Nero. Then listen to my talke a while, Sir Knight and I will shew,
If case you will reaunswe me, my question to obsoleue,
The which propound within my mind, doth oftentimes reuolue.

Clyo. I will O Princes answe you as apely as I may.

Nero. Well then Sir Knight, apply your eares, and listen what I say:
A ship that stormes had tossed long, amidst the mounting waues,
Where harbour none was to be had, felt Fortune so depraues:
Through ill successe that ship of hope, that Anchors hold doth faille,
Yet at the last shees driven to land, with broken Mast and saile:
And through the force of furious wind, and Billowes bounsing blowes,
She is a simple shipwracke made, in euery point God knowes.
Now this same ship by chance being found, the finders take such paine,
That fit to saile vpon the Seas, they rig her vp againe.
And where she was through storms fore shakt, they make her whole & soud
Now answe me directly here, vpon this my propound.

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

*If this same ship thus rent and torne, being brought in forme rite,
Should not supply the finders true to profit his estate
In what she might.*

*Cho. Herein a right,
I will O Princesse as I may, directly answere you.
This ship thus found, / pur the case is hath an owner now,
Which owner shall sufficiently content the finders charge:
And haue againe to serue his vse, his ship, his boate or barge.
The ship then carnot serue the turne of finders, this is plaine,
If case the owner do content, or pay him for his paine:
But otherwise if none lay claime, nor seeme that ship to stay,
Then is it requisit it should, the finders paines repay:
For such endeavour as it is to serue for his behoove.*

Nero. What owner truly that it hath, / haue no certaine proofe.

*Cho. Then can I not define thereof, but thus I wish it were,
That you would me accept to be, that ship O Lady faire:
And you the finder, then it should be needless for to moone,
If I the ship, of dutie ought to serue at your behoove.*

Nero. Thou art the ship O worthy Knight, so shivered found by mee.

*Cho. And owner haue I none deare dame, I yeld me whole to thee:
For as this ship I must confesse, that was a shipwrack made,
Thou hast restored me vnto health, whom sicknesse causid to vade,
For which I yeld O Princesse deare, at pleasure thine to be,
If your grace, O noble Dame, will so accept of me.*

Nero. If case I will, what haue you showne?

Cho. Because I am to you vnkownne.

Nero. Your fame importeth what you be.

Cho. You may your pleasure say of me.

Nero. What I haue laid due proofe do shewe.

*Cho. Well Lady deare, to thee I owe
More seruice then of dutie I am able to professe,
For that thou didst preserue my life amidst my deepe distresse:
But at this time I may not stay, O Lady here with thee,
Thou knowest the cause, but this I vow within three score dayes to bee,
If destinie restraine me not, at Court with thee againe,
Protesting whilst that life doth last, thine faulfull to remaine.*

The Historie of Clymon

Nero. And is there then no remedie, but needs you will departe?

Clyo. No Princesse for a certaintie, but here I leave my harte,

In gage with thee till my retурne, which as I said shall be:

Nero. Well, sith no perswasion may preuaile, this Iewell take of me,

And keepe it alwayes for my sake.

Clyo. Of it a deare account ile make, yet let vs part deare Dame with ioy,

And to do the same I will my selfe employ.

Nero. Well now adieu till thy retурne, the Gods thy journey guide. Exit.

Clyo. And happily in absence mine, for thee deare Dame provide:

Ah Clymon let dolours dig, drive daunts from out thy mind,

Since in the sight of Fortune now, such fayour shou dost find,

As for to haue the loue of her whom thou didst sooner judge,

Would haue denied thy loyaltie, and gainst thy good will grudge,

But that I may here keepe my day, you sacred Gods provide,

Most happie fare vnto my state, and thus my journey guide:

The which I tempe to take in hand Clamydes for to meete:

That the whole cause of my fayur to him I may repeate,

So shall I seeme for to excuse my selfe in way of right,

And not be counted of my foe, a false periuured Knight. Exit.

Enter Thrasellus King of Norway, two Lords.

Thras. Where deepe desire hath taken toote, my Lords alas you see,

How that perswasion doth not, if conuincie is boord, to haue me to vnto the fayre

Vnto the fayre expested hope, where fancie hath take place,

And vaine it is for to withdraw, by counsell in that case:

The mind who with affection is, to one only thing affected,

The which may not till dñe of death, from them be sure rejected:

You know my Lords through fame, what force of loue hath taken place,

Within my breast as touching now. *Nero*is noble grace,

Daughter to Patrenius King, who doth the Scepter sway:

And in the Ile of Marshes eke, beare rule now at this day.

Through loue of daughter his, my sorrowes daily grow;

And daily dolours do me daunt, for that alas I shew

Such Friendship whereas fayour none, is to be found againe:

And byt from out my carefull mind, noughte may her loue restraine.

I sent to craue her of the king, he answered me with nay:

But shall I not provide by force to fetch her thence awaies.

Yes

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Yes, yes, my Lords, and therefore let your aydes be prest with mine,
For I will sure Neronis haue, or else my dayes ile pine.

For King Patranus and his power, I hold of small account,
To winne his daughter to my spouse, amids his men ile mount.

1 Lord. Most worthy Prince, this rash attempte, I hold not for the best,
For sure Patranus power is great, and not to be supprest.

For why, the ile enuirond is, with sea on every side,
And landing place lo is there none, whereas you may haue tide
To set your men from ship to shore, but by one onely way,
And in that place a garrison great, he keepeth at this day.
So that if you should bring your power, your trauell were in vaine,
That is not certainly the way, Neronis for to gaine.

But this your grace may do indeed, and so I counte it best,
To be in all points with a Ship, most like a Merchant prest :
And saile with such as you thinke best, all drest in Merchants guise,
And for to get her to your Ship, some secret meane devise,
By shewing of strange Merchandies, or other such like thing,
Lo this is best advise I can, Thrasellus Lord and King.

2 Lord. And certainly as you haue sayd, my Lord it is the way,
Wherefore o King, do prosecute the same without delay.

Thrasell. Of truthe my Lords this your advise doth for our purpose frame,
Come therefore let vs hence depart, to put in vre the same
With present speed, for Merchant-wise my selfe will thither saile :

1 Lord. This is the way if any be, of purpose to preuaile.

Exeunt.

Enter Clyomon with a Knight, signifying one of those that Clamydes had deluined.

Clyomon. Sir Knight, of truthe this fortune was most luckely assignd,
That we shold meeet in trauell thus, for thereby to my mind
You haue a castle of comfort brought, in that you haue me told,
Clamydes our appointed day, no more then I did hold.

Knight. No certis sir he kept not day, the cause I haue exprest,
Through that inchanter Bryan charmes, he came full sore distressed :
Yet fortune fauored so his state, that through his help all wee
Which captiues were through cowardly craft, from bondage were set free :
And at our parting willed vs, if any with you met,

The Historie of Clyomon

We shoulde informe you with the truthe what was his onely let.

Clyomon. Well, know you where he abideth now, sir Knight I crave of curtesie?

Knight. No questionlesse I know not I, to say it of a certaintie.

Clyomon. Well then adue sir Knight with thanks, I let you on your way:
Knight. Vnto the gods I you commit, nought else I haue to say. Exit.

Clyomon. A serra, now the hugie heapes of cares that lodged in my mind
Is skaled from their nestling place, and pleasures passage find.

For that as well as Clyomon, Clamydes broke his day,

Vpon which newes my passage now in seeking him ile stay:

And to Neronis back againe, my ioyfull iourney make,

Leaſt that ſhe ſhould in absence mine, ſome cauſe of ſorrow take.

And now all dumps of deadly dole, that danted knightly breft,

Adue, ſince ſalue of ſolace ſweete, hath ſorrowes all ſuppreſt.

For that Clamydes cannot brag, nor me accuſe in ought,

Vnto the gods of deſtineies, that thus our fates hath brought

In equall ballance to be wayed, due praises ſhall I ſend,

That thus to way each cauſe aright, their eyes to earth did bendl.

Well, to keepe my day with Lady now, I mind not to be ſlack,

Wherfore vnto Patranus court, ile drefſe my iourney back.

But ſtay, me thinks I Rumor heare throughout this land to ring,

I will attend his talke, to know what tidings he doth bring.

Enter Rumor running.

Ye rowling Clowdes giue Rumor roome, both ayre and earth below,

By ſea and land, that every eare may vnderſtand and know,

What wofull hap is chaunced now within the ile of late,

Which of ſtrange Marshes beareth name, ynto the nobleſt ſtate.

Neronis daughter to the King, by the King of Norway he,

Within a ſhip of Marchandise, conuayed away is ſhe.

The King with ſorow for her ſake, hath to death refignd,

Mustantius brother to the King, from her the Crowne would take,

But till ſhe be deliuered, the Lords did order make,

That they before King Alexander, thither comming ſhould appeale,

And he by whom they hold the Crowne, therin ſhould rightly deale

For either part, lo this to tell, I Rumor haue in charge,

And

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

And throughall lands I do pretend, to publish it at large.

Exit.

Clyomon. Ah wofull Rumor raunging thus, what tidings do I heare,

Hath that false King of Norway stolne my loue and Lady deare?

Ah hart, ah hand, ah head and mind, and every sence beside,

To serue your maisters turne in need, do every one provide.

For till that I reuenged be vpon that wretched king,

And haue againe my Lady deare, and her from Norway bring,

I vow this body takes no rest, ah fortune fickle dame,

That canst make glad and so soone sad, a Knight of worthie fame.

But what should I delay the time, now that my deare is gone?

Auaileth ought to ease my griefe, to make this penisue mon.

No, no, wherefore come courage to my hart, and happie hands prepare,

For of that wretched King I will wreake all my sorrow and care.

And mauges all the might he may, be able for to make,

By force of armes my lady I, from him and his will take.

Exit.

Enter Clamydes and Shift, with his bag of money still.

Clamy. Come knowledge, thou art much to blame, thus for to lode thy self

To make thee on thy way diseased, with carying of that pelfe.

But now take courage vnto thee, for to that ile I will,

Which of strange Marshes called is, for fame declareth still

The Knight of the golden Sheeld is there, and in the court abideth,

Thither will I him to meete, whatsoeuer me betideth:

And know his name, as thou canst tell my father charged me,

Or else no more his princely court nor person for to see.

Come therefore, that vnto that ile we may our iourney take,

And afterwards hauing met with him, our viage for to make

To Denmarke to my Lady there, to shew her all my eace,

And then to Swania if her I haue, vnto my fathers grace.

Shift. Nay but art shall please you, are you sure the Knight of the golden Sheeld in the ile of strange Marshes is?

Clamy. I was informed credibly, I warrant thee we shall not mis.

Exit.

Shift. Then keepe on your way, ile follow as fast as I can,

Faith he euen meanes to make a marris of poore Shift his man.

And I am so tied to this bag of gold I got at Bryansance foyes,

That I tell you where this is, there all my ioy is:

Exit.

The Historie of Chyomon

But I am so weary, sometimes with ryding, sometimes with running,
And other times going a foote:
That when I came to my lodging at night, to bring me a woman it is no
And such care I take for this pelfe, least I should it lose, (boote.
That where I come ghat it is gold, for my life I dare not disclose.
Well after my maister I must, heeres nothing stil but running and ryding;
But ile giue him the slip sure, if I once come where I may haue quiet bidng.

Ester Neronis in the Farrest, in mans apparell.

Ne. As Hare the Hound, as Lambe the Wolfe, as foule the Fawcons dñe,
So do I flie from tyrant he, whose heart more hard then flint
Hath lacke pn me such hugie heapes of seacleis sorrowes here,
That sure it is intollerable, the tormentes that I beare:
Neronis, ah who knoweth thee, a Prince to be borne,
Since fatall Gods so frowardly, thy fortune doth adorne:
Neronis, ah who knoweth her, in painfull Pages shew:
But no good Lady wil me blame, which of my case doth know:
But rather when they heare the truth, wherefore I am disguised,
Thaile say it is an honest shifte, the which I haue devised:
Since I haue given my faith and troth to such a brute of fame,
As is the knight of the Golden Shield, and tyrants seekes to frame
Their engins to detract our vowes, as the king of Norway hath,
Who of all Princes living now, I finde deuoyd of faith:
For like a wolfe in lambes skin clad, he commeth with his aide,
All Marchant like to fathers Court, and ginneth to perswade
That he had precious jewelis bought, which in his ship did lye,
Wherof he wil me take my choyce, if case I would them buy:
Then I mistrusting no deceit, with handmaids one or two
With this deceitfull Marchant then vnto the ship did go.
No sooner were we vnder hatch, but vp they hoyst their saile,
And hauing then so serue their turne, a mery Westerne gaile:
We were laſht out from the hauen, lo a dozen leagues and more,
When still I thought the Barke had bene, at anker by the shore:
But being brought by Norway here, not long in Court I was,
But that to get from thence away, I broughte this feare to passe:
For making semblance vnto him as though I did him loue,
He gaue me libertie, or ought that Ieru'd for my behoue: And

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

And hating libertie, I wrought by such a secret flight,
That in this tyre like to a page, I scapt away by night.
But ah I feare that by pursute, he wil me overtake,
Well here entreth one, to whom some fute for seruice I wil make.

Enter Corin a Shepheard.

Nero. No truly fathur.

Cor. Then come with me, by gos bones chil never forsake thee.

The Historie of Chyomon

Whow bones of my zoule, thowilt be þ brauest shepherds boy in our town,
Thous go to church in this coate, beuore Madge a sonday in her gray gown.
Good lord how our church-wardens wil looke vpō thee, bones of god zeest,
There will be more looking at thee, then our sir Iohn the parish preest.
Why euery body wil aske whose boy thart, an cha cā tel the this by the way,

But theres Frumptons wench in the freese scake, it will do thee good to see
What canuosing is at the milking time, betweene her and mee.
And those wenches will loue thee bonnombly in euery place,
But do not vall in with them in any kind of case.

Nero. Tush, you shall not neede to feare me, I can be mery with measure as well as they :

Coryn. Wel then come follow after me, and home chil leade thee the way.

Nero. Alas poore simple Shepheard, by this Princes may see,
That like man, like talke, in euery degree. Exeunt.

Enter Thrasellus King of Norway, and two Lords.

Thras. My Lords pursue her speedely, she cannot far be gone,
And lo himselfe to seeke her out, your King he will be one.
Ah fraudulent dame, how hath she glozd, from me to get away?
With sugred words how hath she fed, my senses night and day?
Professing loue with outward shewes, and inwardly her hart
To practise such a deepe deceit, whereby she might depart
From out my court so sodainly, when I did wholy iudge
She loued me most entirely, and not against me grudge.

She made such signes by outward shewes, I blame not wit and policie,
But here I may exclaime and say, fy e, fy e, on womens subtiltie.
Well well my Lords, no time delay, pursue her with all speed,
And I this forest will seeke out my selfe, as is decreed,
With aide of such as are behind, and will come vnto mee :

Ambo. We shal not flake what here in charge to vs is giue by thee. Exeunt.

Thras. Ah subtil Nerois, how hast thou me vexed?
Through thy crafty dealings how am I perplexed?
Did ever any winne a daime, and lose her in such sort?
The malaches are maruellous, the which I do suppose

Through

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Through her deceit, but forth I will my company to meete,
If euer she be caught againe, I will her so intreate,
That others all shal warning take, by such a subtil dame,
How that a Prince for to delude, such ingins they do frame.

Enter Clyomon Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Cly. Nay Traytour stay, and take with thee that mortall blow or stroke
The which shall cause thy wretched corps this life for to reuoke.
It ioyeth me at the hart that I haue met thee in this place.

Thras. What varlet darest thou be so bold, with words in such a case,
For to vphraide thy Lord and King? what art thou soone declare?

Clyo. My Lord and King, I thee defie, and in despite I dare
Thee for to say thou art no Prince, for thou a Traytour art,
And what reward is due therefore, to thee I shall imparte.

Thras. Thou bragges all too boldly still, what hight thy name expresse?
Clyo. What hight my name thou shalt not know, ne will I it confesse:
But for that thou my Lady stolest from fathers court away,
Ile sure reuenge that trayterous fact vpon thy flesh this day.
Since I haue met so luckely with thee here all alone,
Although as I do vnderstand, from thee she now is gone,
Yet therefore do defend thy selfe, for here I thee assayle,

Thras. Alas poore boy, thinkest thou against me to preuaile?
Here let them fight, the King fall downe dead.

Thras. Ah heauens, Thraselus he is slaine, ye Gods his ghost receiu,

Clyo. Now hast thou iustice for thy fact, as thy desert doeth craue:
But ah alas poore Clyomon, though thou thy foe hast slaine,
Such greeuous wounds thou hast receiu'd; as doth increase thy paine.
Vnles I haue some speedy help, my life must needly wast,
And then as well as traytour false, my corps of death shall tast.

Ah my Neronis where art thou? ah where art thou become?
For thy sweete sake thy Knight shall here receiu his vitall doome.
Lo here all gorde in bloud thy faithfull Knight doth lye,
For thee, ah faithfull dame, thy Knight for lack of help shall dye.
For thee, ah here thy Clyomon, his mortall stroke hath tane,
For thee, ah these same hands of his, the Norway King hath slaine.
Ah bleeding wounds from ionger talke my soltring tong doth stay,
And if I haue not speedy help, my life doth wast away.

The Historie of Clyomon

Enter father Coryn the Shepheard, and his dog. (flocke)

Coryn. A plague on thee for a cur, A ha, driuen me sheepe aboue from the
A theefe, art not ashame? ile beate thee like a stocke:
And cha beene azeeking here, aboue voire miles and more:
But chill tell you what, chaue the brauest lad of Iack the courtnoll, that euer was zeene beuore.

A, the whorcop is plagely well lou'd in our towne, (gowne,
An you had zeene go to Church beuore Madge my wife in her holy day
You would haue blest your zelues t'auie seene it, she w̄t eu'en cheke by ioule
With our head controms wife, brother to my nabour Nycholl,
You know ha dwels by maister Iustice, ouer the water on the other side of the hill,

Cham zure you know it, betweene my nabour Filchers varme hōuse, and the wind-mill.

But an you did zee how Ione Jenkin, and Gilian Giffrey loues my boy Iacke,
Why it is maruelation to see, Ione did so bast Gilians backe,
That by Gos bones I laught till cha be pist my zelfe, when cha zaw it,
All the maides in towne valls out for my boy, but and the yongmen know it
Thale be zo ielisom ouer them, that cham in doubt
Ich shall not keepe Iack my boy till seuen yeares go about.

Well, cham nere the neere vor my shepe, chaue soughe it this voire mile,
But chill home, and send Iack foorth to zeeke it another while.

But bones of God man stay, Iesu whather wilt? whā what meanist lye heere?

Clyomon. Ah good father: help me.

Coryn. Nay who there, by your leaue, chill not come neere.

What another? bones of me, he is either kild or dead?

Nay varewell vorty pence, yeare a knaue, gos death a doth b'eede.

Clyomon. I bleede indeede father, so grieuons my wounds bee,
That if I haue not speedie help, long life is not in mee.

Coryn. Why what art thou? or how chanſt thou cam'ſt in this case?

Clyomon. Ah father, that dead corps which thou seest there in place,
He was a Knight, and mine enemy, whome here I haue slaine,
And I a Gentleman, whom he hath wounded with maruellous paine.
Now thou knowest the truth, good father shew some curtesie
To stop my bleeding wounds, that I may finde some remedie,
My life to preserue, if possible I may.

Coryn.

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Coryn. Well heare you gentl-man, should haue you know this by the way,
Cham but vther Coryn the sheepleard, cham no surringer I,
But chill d^r what cha can voryd; cha wete loth to see you die,
Loe how zay you by this, haue cha done you any easer?

Ch^ra. Father thy willingnesse of a certaintie, doth me much please;
But good father lend me thy helping hand once againe,
To burie this same Knight whom here I haue slaine,
Although he was to me a most deadly enemie,
Yet to leaue his body vnburied, were great exmeltie.

Coryn. Bones of God man, our Priest dwells too farne away.

Ch^ro. Well, then for want of a Priest, the Priests part I will play:
Therefore father, helpe me to lay his body aright:
For I will bestow a herse of him, because he was a Knight:
If shou wile go to a Cottage hardy, and fetch such things as I lacke.

Coryn. That chill Gentleman, and by and by returne backe.

Exit.

Ch^ro. But Ch^romon pluck vp thy heart, with courage once againe,
And I will set ouer his dead Coate in signe of vistorne,
My Gouden Sheeld and Sword, but with the poynt hanging downe,
As one conquer'd and lost his renowme.
Writing likewise thereupon, that all pass'gers may see,
That the false King of Normay, liere lieth slaine by me.

Enter Coryn with a Hearse.

Co. Lo Gentleman, cha brought zuch thinges, as are requisite for the same;

Ch^ro. Then good father helpe me, the Hearse for to frame.

Chat shall Gentleman, in the best order that cha may:

O that our Parish Priest were here, that you might heare him say, Vor by gos bones, an there be any noyse in the Church, in the midst of his prayers heele sweare.

A he loues hunting a life, would to God you were acquainted with him a while,

And as vor a woman, well chill zay nothing, but cha knowe whom hee did beguile.

Ch^ro. Well father Coryn let that passe, wee haue nothing to do withall,
And now that this is done, come reward thy paine I shall.
There is part of a recompence, thy good will to requite.

The Historie of Clyomon

Coryn. By my troth cha thank you, cha bound to pray vor you day and
And now chil eue home, & send Iack my boy this sheep to seek out: (night.

Clyo. Tell me father etc, thou goest, didst thou not see a Lady wandring (here about?)

Cor. A Lady, no good yaith gentleman, cha zaw none cha tel you plane:

Clyo. Wel then farewel father, gramercies for thy paine.

Ah Neronis where thou art, or where thou doest abide,

Thy Clyomon to seeke thee out shall rest no time nor tide:

Thy foe here lieth slaine on ground, and liuing is thy frenid,
Whose trauel til he see thy face, shall never haue an end.

My Ensigne here I leaue behind, these verses witt shall yeeld

A true report of traytor slaine, by the knight of the golden sheeld.

And as vñknowne to any wight, so trauell I betake,

Vntil I may her fide, whose light my hart may ioyfull make.

Exit.

Enter Shife very braue.

Shift. Iesu what a gazing do you make at me, to see me in a gowne?

Do you not know after trauell, men being in Court or in Towne,

And specially such as is of any reputation, they must vse this guise,

Which signifieth a fole to be sage, graue, and of counsell wise.

But where are we thinke you now, that Shift is so braue?

Not running to seeke the knight of the golden sheeld, an other office I haue:

For comming here to the court, of strange Marshes so named,

Where King Alexander in his owne person lies, that Prince mightily famed.

Betweene Mustantius brother to the late king deceased

And the Queene, through King Alexander, a strife was appeased:

But how or which way I thinke you do not know,

Well then giue eare to my tale, and the truth I wil show:

The old King being dead, through sorrow for Neronis,

Whom we do heare, Louer to the Knight of the Golden Sheeld is.

The Queene being with child, the scepter asked to sway,

But Mustantius the Kings brother, he did it denay.

Whereof great contention grew, amongst the Nobles on either side,

But being by them agreed the iudgement to abide

Of King Alexander the great, who then was comming hither,

At his arriuall to the Courte, they all were cald together.

The matter being heard, this sentence was giuen,

That

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

That either partie shoulde haue a Champion to combat them betwene:
That which Champion were overcome, the other shoulde sway,
And to be foughten after that time, the sixteene day.
Now my maister Clamydes commyngh hither, for Mustantius wil he bee,
But vpon the Queenes side, to venter none can we see:
And yet she maketh proclamation through every land:
To giue great giftis to any that will take the combat in hand.
Well within ten daies is the time, and king Alexander bee
Staieth till the day appointed, the triall to see:
And if none came at the day for the Queenes to fighte,
Then without trauel to my maister, Mustantius hath his righte.
But to see all things in a readines, against thappointed day:
Like a shifing knaue for aduantage, to Court he take my way.

Exit.

Enter Neronis like a Sheepheards boy.

Nero. The painfull pathes, the wearie wayes, the trauels and ill fare,
That simple feete, to Princes seeme, in practise verie rare,
As I poore Dame, whose pensiuе heart, no pleasure can delighte,
Since that my state so cruelly, sell Fortune holds in spighte.
Ah poore Neronis in thy hand, is this a seemely shewe,
Who shouldest in Court thy Lute supple, where pleasures erst did flower?
Is this an instrument for thee to guide a sheepheards flocke?
That art a Princes by thy birth, and borne of noble stocke.
May mind from mourning more refraine, to thinke on former state?
May heart from sighing eke abstaine, to see this simple rater?
May eyes from downe distilling teates, when thus a loue I am,
Resistance make, but must they not, through ceaselesse sorrowes frame:
A Riuier of bedewed drops, for to distill my face?
Ah heauens when you are reuengd inough, then looke vpon my case:
For till I heare some newes alas vpon thy louing Knight,
I dare not leaue this loathsome life, for feare of greater spight:
And now as did my maister will, as sheepe that is astray
I must go seeke her out againe, by wild and wearie way.

BA

The Historie of Clymon.

Ah wofull sight, what is alas, with these mine eyes beheld,
That to my louing Knight belangd, / view the Golden Sheeld:
Ah heauens, this Herte doth signifie my Knight is slaine,
Ah death no longer do delay, but rid the liues of twaine:
Heart, hand, and euerie sense prepare, vnto the Hearse drawne:
And thereupon subiue your selues, disdaine not sor to die,
With him that was your mistresse ioy, her life and death like case,
And well I know am seeking me, he did his end embrase,
That cruell wretch that Norway King, this cursed deed hath dunne,
But now to cut that lingard thred, that Leachis long hath spunne,
The sword of this my leaching knight, behold / here do take,
Of this my wofull corps alas, a small end to make:
Yet ere I strike that deadly strok, that shall my life deprave,
Ye muses ayd me to the Gods, for mercie first to craue.

Sing heere.

Well now you heauens receive thy ghost, my corps I leaue behinde,
To be inclosd with his in earth, by those that shall it find.

Desmond Prouidence.

Promi. Stay, stay thy strok, chou yofull Dame, what wile thou thus dispairest.

Behold to let this wifull fact, I Prouidence prepaire
To thee, from seate of mightie loue, looks herupon againe,
Reade, that if case thou canst it read, and see if he be slaine
Whom thou doest loue.

Nero. Ah heauens aboue, or to an and honest knyght
All laud and prais and honoir due, to you / here do render,
That would vouchsafe your handmaid here, in wofull state to tender,
But by these same Veres do I find, my faithfull knight doth lie,
Whose hand vnto my deadly foe, the mortall strok did give:
Whose cursed carkasse loe it is, which here on ground doth lie,
Ah honour due for this / yeeld, to mightie loue on hi.

Promi. Well, let desperation die in thee, I may not here remaine,
But be assured, that thou shalt ere long thy knight attaine.

Ascend.

Nero. And for their prouidence divine, the Gods aboue ile praise
And shew their works so wonderfull, vnto their laud alwaies.

Well

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Well, sith that the gods by prouidence hath signed vnto mee
Such comfort sweete in my distresse, my Knight againe to see,
Farewell all feeding Shepherds flocks, vnseemly for my state,
To seeke my loue I will set forth, in hope of friendly fate.
But first to Shepherds house I will, my pages tyre to take,
And afterwards depart from thence, my iourney for to make.

Exit.

Enter Sir Clyomon.

Cho. Long haue I sought but all in vaine, for neither far nor neare
Of my Neronis wofull dame, by no meanes can I heare.
Did euer fortune violate two louers in such sort?
The grieves ah are intollerable, the which I do support
For want of her, but hope somewhat revives my pensiue hart,
And doth to me some sodaine cause of comfort now impart
Through newes I heare, as I abroad in weary trauell went,
How that the Queene her mother hath her proclamations sent Through every land, to get a Knight to combat on her side,
Against Mustanias, Duke and Lord, to haue a matter tride:
And now the day is very nigh, as I do vnderstand,
In hope to meete my Lady there I will into that land:
And for her mother vndertake the combat for to trye,
Yea though the other Hector were, I would him not denye
What soeuer he be, but ere I go, a golden Sheeld ile have,
Although vnowne, I will come in, as doth my Knighthood craue:
But couered will I keepe my Sheeld, because ile not be knowne,
If case my Lady be in place, till I haue prowesse showne.
Well, to haue my Sheeld in readinesse, I will no time delay,
And then to combat for the Queene, I straight will take my way.

Exit.

Enter Neronis like the Page.

Nero. Ah weary paces that I walke, with steps vnsteddy still,
Of all the gripes of grislie grieves, Neronis hath her fill.
And yet amids these miseries, which were my first mishaps,
By brute I heare such newes alas, as more and more inwraps
My wretched corps with thousand woes, more then I may support,
So that I am to be compard vnto the scaled foit,
Which doth so long as men and might, and sustenance preuaile,

The Historie of Clyomon

Give to the enemies repulse, that commeth to assailes
But when assistance gins to faile, and strength of foes increase,
They forced are through battering blowes, the same for to release.
So likewise I so long as hope, my comfort did remaine,
The grieify greefes that me assaile, I did repulse againe:
But now that hope begins to faile, and greefes anew do rise,
I must of force yeld vp the Forte, I can no way devise
To keepe the same, the Forte I meane, it is the wearie corse,
Which sorrowes daily do assaile, and siege without remorse:
And now to make my greefes the more, report alas hath told,
How that my fathers aged bones, is shrinde vp in mold,
Since Norway king did me betray, and that my mother shee,
Through Duke Mustantius, vncle mine, in great distresse to bee:
For swaying of the Septer there, what should I herein say?
Now that I cannot find my knight, I would at combat day
Be gladly there, if case I could with some good maister meete,
That as his Page in these affaires, would seeme me to intreate:
And in good time, here commeth one, he seemes a knight to be,
He profer seruice, if in case, he will accept of me.

Enter Clyomon with his Sheeld couered, strangely disguised.

Clyo. Well, now as one vnowne, I will go combat for the Queen:
Who can bewray me, since my Sheeld is not for to be seene?
But stay, who do I here espie? of truth a proper Boy,
If case he do a maister lacke, he shall sustaine no noy:
For why in these affaires, he may stand me in passing steed.

Nero. Well, I see to passe vpon my way, this Gentlemans decreeed,
To him I will submit my selfe, in seruice for to be,
If case he can his fancie frame, to like so well on me.
Well met sir knight vpon your way.

Clyo. My Boy gramecies, but to me say,
Into what countrey is thy iourney dight?

Nero. Towards the strange Marsh, of truth Sir Knight.

Clyo. And thither am I going, high loue be my guide.

Nero. Would Gods I were worthy to be your Page by your side.

Clyo. My Page my boy, why what is thy name? that let me heare.

Nero. Sir Knight, by name I am called Cur Daceer.

Clyo. Chr.

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

*Cho. Cur Daceer, what heart of Steele, now certis my boy:
I am a Gentleman, and do entertaine thee with ioy:
And to the strange Marshes am I going, the Queene to defend,
Come therefore, for without more saying, with me thou shalt wend.*

Exit.

*Nero. As diligent to do my dutie as any in this land:
Ah Fortune, how fauourable my friend doth she stand:
For thus no man knowing mine estate nor degree,
May I passe safely, a Page as you see.*

Exit.

Enter Bryan sance foy with the Head.

*Bry. Euen as the Owle that hides her head, in hollow tree till night,
And dares not while sir Phœbus shines, attempt abroad in flight:
So likewise I as Buzzard bold, while chearefull day is seene,
Am forst with Owle to hide my selfe, amongst the Iuie greene:
And dares not with the seelie Snaile, from cabbin shew my head,
Till Vesper I behold aloft, in skies begin to spread:
And then as Owle that flies abroad when other fowles do rest,
I creepe out of my drowsie denne, when summons hath supprest
The head of euerie valiant heart, loe thus I shrowd the day,
And trauell as the Owle by night vpon my wished way:
The which hath made more tedious my iourney, by halfe part,
But blame not Bryan, blame alas, his cowardly catiffes hart:
Which dares not shewe it selfe by day, for feare of worthy wights,
For none can trauell openly, to escape the venturous Knights,
Vnlesse he haue a noble mind, and eke a valiant hart,
The which I will not brag vpon, I assure you for my part:
For if the courage were in me, the which in other is,
Idoubtles had inioyed the wight whom I do loue ere this.
Well, I haue not long to trauell now, to Denmark I draw neare,
Bearing knight Clamydes name, yet Bryan sance foy am I,
But though I do vsurpe his name, his sheeld or ensigne here,
Yet can I not vsurpe his heart, still Bryans heart I beare:
Well, I force not that, he is safe enough, and Bryan as I am,
I will vnto the Court, whereas I shall enjoy that dame.*

Enter Shift like a Wiffler.

Shift. Rowme there for a reckning, see I beseech you if thale stand out of Jesu, Jesu, why do you not know that this is the day (the way,
That the combat must passe for Mustanis and the Queene?
But to fight vpon her side as yet no Champion is seene.
And Duke Mustanis he smilcs in his sleeve, because he doth see
That neither for loue nor rewards, any one her Champion will be.
Ant were not but that my maister the other Champion is,
To fight for the Queene my selfe, I surely would not mis.
Alas good Lady, she and her child is like to lose all the land,
Because none will come in, in her defence for to stand.
For where she was in election, if any Champion had come
To rule till she was deliuered, and have the Princes roome:
Now shall Duke Mustanis be sure the Scepter to sway,
If that none do come in to fight in her cause this day.
And King Alexander all this while hath he stayed the triall to see,
Well here they come, roome there for the King, heres such thrusting of women as it grieueth mee.

Enter King Alexander, the Queene, Mustanis, two Lords, and Clamydes like a Champion.

Mustan. O Alexander lo behold, before thy royll grace
My Champion here at pointed day I do present in place.

Alexand. Well sir Duke in your defence is he content to be?

Clamy. Yea worthy Prince, not fearing who encounter shall with me:
Although he were with Hercules of equall power and might,
Yet in the cause of this same Duke, I challenge him the fight.

Alexa. I like your courage well sir Knight: what shal we call your name?

Clamy. Clamydes, sonne to the Swaian King, O Prince so hight the same.

Alexa. Now certaintly I am right glad Clamydes for to see,
Such valiant courage to remaine within the mind of thee.
Well Lady, according to the orderane herein, what do you say,
Haue you your Champion in like case, now ready at the day?

Queene. No sure o King no Champion I, haue for to ayde my cause,
Vnlesse twill please your noble grace on further day to pause.
For I haue sent throughout this Ile, and every forraine land,
But none as yet hath proffered, to take the same in hand.

Alex. No,

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Alex. No, I am more sorie certainly, your chance to see so ill,
But day deferred cannot be, vntesse Mustantius will,
For that his Champion readie here, in place he doth present,
And who so missed at this day, should loose by full consent
Of either part, the tytle right, and sway of regall Mace,
To this was your consentment giuen, as well as his in place,
And therefore without his assent, we cannot referre the day?

Shift. Ant shall please your grace, herein trie Mustantius what he will say.

Alex. How say you Mustantius, are you content the day to deferre?

Mustan. Your Grace will not will me I trust, for then from law you are;
And hauing not her Champion here, according to decree,
There resteth nought for her to loose, the Crowne belongs to mee.

Shift. Nay ant shall please your grace, rather then she shall it lose,
I my selfe will be her Champion for halfe a doozen blowes.

Mustan. Wilt thou? then by full congo to the Challenger there stands.

Shift. Nay soft, of sufferance commeth easse, though I cannot rule my tongue, ile rule my hands.

Mustan. Well noble Alexander, sith that she wants her Champion as yousee,
By greement of your royll grace, the Crowne belongs to mee.

Alex. Nay Mustantius, she shall haue law, wherefore to sound begin,
To see if that in three houres space no Champion will come in.

Sound here once.

Of truthe Madam I sorie am, none will thy cause maintaine,
Well, according to the law of Armes, yet Trumpet sound againe.

Sound second time.

What, and is there none will take in hand, to Combat for the Queene?

Shift. Faith I thinke it must be I must do the deed, for none yet is scene.

Queene. O King let pittie pleade for me, here in your gracious sight,
And for so slender cause as this deprive me not of right:
Consider once I had to spowse a Prince of worthy fame,
Though now blind Fortune spurne at me, her spighte I needs must blame,
And though I am bereft O King, both of my child and mate,
Your Grace some greement may procure, consider of my state,
And suffer not a Widow Queene with wrong oppressed so,
But pitie the young Infants case, wherewith O King I go:

The Historie of Clyomon

And thought I suffer wrong, let that find fauour in your sight.

King. Why Lady I respect you both, and sure wold if I might Entreat Mustan thereunto, some such good order frame,
Your strife should cease, and yet each one well pleased with the same.

Queene. I know your grace may him perswade, as reason wils no lesse.

King. Well Sir Mustan, then your mind to me in breefe expresse,
Will you vnto such order stand here limited by me,
Without deferring longer time, say on if you agree?

Mustan. In hope your grace my state will way, I give my glad consent.

King. And for to end all discord say, Madame, are you content?

Queene. Yea noble King.

King. Well then before my nobles all, give eare vnto the King,
For swaying of the sword and Mace all discord to beate downe,

The child when it is borne, we elect to weare the Crowne.

And till that time Mustan, you of lands and liuing heere,
Like equall part in euerie point, with this the Queene shall share:

But to the child when it is borne, if Gods grant it to liue,

The kingdome whole in every part, as tytle we do giue.

But yet Mustan, we will yeeld this recompence to you,

You shall receiue ffe thousand Crownes for yearly pension due,

To maintaine your estate, while you here liue and do remaine,

And after let the whole belong vnto the Crowne againe.

Now say your minds if you agree.

Page. I would she like chiose were put to me.

Mustan. I for my part O Noble King therewith am well content:
Well better halfe then nought at all, I likewise giue consent.

Enter Clyomon, as to Combat.

Clyo. Renowned King and most of fame, before thy royll grace,
The Queene to aid, I do present my person here in place.

Mustan. You come too late in faith Sir knight, the houre and time is past.

Clyo. Your houre I am not to respect, I entered with the blast.

Clamy. What Princox is it you, are come to combat for the Queene?
Good Fortune now, I hope ere long your courage shall be seene.

Clyo. And sure I count my hap as good, to meeete with you Sir knight,
Come according to your promise made, prepare your selfe to fight.

Clamy. I

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Clamy. I knew you well inough sir, although your sheeld were hid from mee.

Clyo. Now you shall seele me as well as know me, if hand and hart agree.

King. Stay, stay Sir knights, I charge you not in combat to proceed,

For why the quarell ended is, and the parties are agreed:

And therefore we discharge you both, the combat to refraine:

Page. The heauens therefore O noble King, thy happie sheeld remaine.

Clamy. O King although we be dischardg'd for this contention now,

Betwixt vs twaine there resteth yet a combat made by vow:

Which should be fought before your Grace: and since we here be met,

To iudge twixt vs for victorie, let me your Grace entreat.

King. For what occasion is your strifes sir knights, first let me know?

Clamy. The trueth thereof renowned king thy servant he shall shew:

What time O King, as I should take of Suania king my sier,

The noble orders of a Knight, which long I did desier:

This knight a straunger comes to court, and at that present day,

In cowardly wise he comes by stealth, and takes from me away

The honour that I shoul'd haue had, for which my father he,

Did of his blessing giue in charge, O noble king to me,

That I shoul'd know his name, that thus bereaued me of my right:

The which he will not shew, vntes he be subdued in fight:

Whereto we either plighted faith, that I shoul'd know his name,

If that before thy Grace O King, my force in fight could frame,

To vanquish him, now hauing met thus happily togither,

Though they are greed, our combat rest, decreed ere we came hither.

Are you that knight that did subdue Sir Samuel in field,

For which you had in recompence of vs, that Golden Sheeld?

Clyo. I am that knight renowned Prince, whose name is yet vnowne,

And since I foyld Sir Samuel, some proweste I haue showne.

Queen. Then as I gesse, you are that Knight by that same sheeld you bear

Which sometime was restored to health within our Pallace here:

By Neronis our daughter she betrayed by Norway king.

Clyo. I am that knight indeed O Queene, whom she to health did bring,

Whose servant euer I am bound wheresoever that she be,

Whose enemie O Queene is slaine pursuing her, by me.

Queene. Know

The Historie of Chyomon

Queene. Know you not where she abides, Sir knight to vs declare?

Chyo. No certis would to Gods I did, she should not liue in care,
But escaped from the Norway king, I am assur'd she is.

Queene. Well her absence was her fathers death, which turn'd to bale my. (blis.)

Chyo. And till I find her out againe, my toile no end shall have Queene. Alas he's nigh inough to her, small toile the space doth craue.

King. Well Sir knights, since that you haue declar'd before me here,
The cause of this the grudge which you to each other beare:

I wish you both a while to pawse, and to my words attend,
If Reason rest with you, be sure Knights, this quarell I will end,
Without the sheadding any bloud betwixt you here in sight:

Clamydes, wey you are nobly borne, and will you then sir Knight,
Go hazard life so desperately? I charge you both refraine,
Since for so smal a cause, the strife doth grow betwixt you twaine:
And let him know your name sir knight, and so your malice end:

Chyo. I haue vowed to the contrary, which vowe I must defend. (knowne)

King. Well though so it be that you haue vowed, your name shall not be
Yet not detracting this your vow, your countrey may be showne,
And of what stocke by birth you bee:

Sbsft. Bur Lady he is dashed now I see.

Chyo. Indeed this hath astond me much, I cannot but confesse,
My countrey and my birth, my state, which plainly wil expresse
My name, for that vnto them all my state is not knowne,

King. Sir knight, of our demand from you againe, what answere shall be

Chyo. Of Denmarke noble Prince I am, and son vnto the king: (showne)

King. Why then sir Chyomon hight your name, as rare report doth ring?

Chyo. It doth indeed so hight my name, O Prince of high renoune,
I am the Prince of Denmarke, sonne, and heire vnto the Crownne.

Clamy. And are you son to Denmarke king? then do imbrace your frend,
Within whose heart here towards you, all malice makes an end:

Who with your sister linked is, in loue with loyall hart:

Chyo. And for her sake, and for thine owne, like friendship I impart.

King. Well sir knights, since friendship rests, where rancor did remaine,
And that you are such friends become, I certaine am right faine,
In hope you wil continue stil, you shall to Court repaire,
And remaine if that you please awhile, to rest you there

Till

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Till time you haue decreed which way your iourney you will frame?
Boch. We yeld you thanks, beseeching loue still to augment your fame.

Exeunt.

Clamydes. Well, come my Chyomon let vs passe, and as we lourne by way,
My most misfortunes vnto thee I wholly will bewray
What hapned in my last affaires, and for thy sisters sake.

Chyomon. Well then Cour d'acer come and waite, your iourney you shall
And seeing thou art prepared, and haft all things in readinesse, (take,
Hast thee before to Denmark with speedinesse,
And tell the King and the Queene that Chyomon their sonne
In health and happie state to their court doth returne,
But in no wise to Isulana say any thing of mee.

Cardasir. I will not shew one word amisse contrary your decree.

Clamydes. Well then my Chyomon, to take our leaue to court let vs repare:

Chyomon. As your friend and companyon Clamydes euery where. Exit.

Neronis. Oh heauens is this my louing knight whom I haue serued so long?
Now haue I ride his faithfull hart, oh so my ioyes doth throng,
To thinke how fortune fauoreth me, Nerones now be glad,
And praise the gods, thy iourney now, such good successe hath had,
To Denmark will I haft with ioy my message to declare,
And tell the King how that his sonne doth homeward now repare.
And more to make my ioyes abound, fortune could never frame
A finer meane to serue my turne, then this, for by the same
I may vnto the Queene declare my state in secret wise,
As by the way I will recount how best I can devise.
Now pack Nerones like a page, haft hence left thou be spide,
And tell thy maisters message there, the gods my iourney guide. Exit.

*Enter King of Denmark, the Queene, Isulana, two Lords.*

King. Come Lady Queene, and daughter eke, my Isulana deare,
We muse that of your Knight as yet no newes againe you heare,
Which did aduenture for your loue the Serpent to subdue.

Isulana. O father, the sending of that worthy knight my woful hart doth rue,
For that alas the furious force of his outragious might,
As I haue heard subdued hath full many a worthy knight.

And this last night O father past, my mind was troubled sore,
Me thought in dreams I saw a Knight not knowne to me before,

H

Which

The Historie of Clymon

Which did present to me the head of that faire monster slaine,
But my Clamydes still in voyce me thought I heard complaine,
As one bereft of all his ioy, now what this dreame doth signifie,
My simple skull will not suffice the truth thereof to specifie.
But sore I feare to contrarie, the expect thereof will hap,
Which will in huge calamities my wofull corps bewrap:
For sending of so worthy a Prince, as was Clamydes he,
To sup his dire destruction thete, for wretched loue of me.

Queene. Tush daughter these but fancies be, which run within your mind:

King. Let them for to supprese your ioyes, no place of harbour find.

Lord. O Princes let no doltors dant, behold your Knight in place:

Julia. Ah happie sight, do I behold my knight Clamydes face?

Enter Bryan Sance foy with the head on his sword.

Bryan. Wel, I haue at last through trauell long, atchiued my iourneys end, Though Bryan, yet Clamydes name, I stoutly must defend.

Ah happie sight, the King and Queene with daughter in lik: case.

I do behold, to them I will present my selfe in place:

The mightie Gods renowned King, thy princely state maintaine:

King. Sir Clamydes, most welcome sure you are to court againe.

Bryan. O Princes lo my promise here performed thou maist see,
The Serpents head by me subdude I do present to thce,
Before thy fathers roiall grace:

Julia. My Clamydes do embrase.

Thy Juliana, whose hart thou haft till vitall race be runner:

Sith for her sake so venturously this deed by thee was done..

Ah welcome home my faithfull Knight:

Bryan. Gramerces noble Lady bright.

King. Well Juliana in our court your louer cause to stay,
For all our Nobles we will send, against your nuptiall day..

Go cary him to take his rest:

Julian. I shall obey your graces hest.

Come my Clamydes go with me, in court your rest to take:

Bryan. I thanke you Lady, now I see accompt of me you make.

Exeunt.

King. Well my Queene, sith daughter ours hath chosen such a make,
The terror of whose valiant hart may cause our foes to quake,

Come

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Come let vs presently depart, and as we did decree,
For all our nobles will we send, their nuptialls for to see.

Queene. As pleaseth thee, thy Lady Queene O king is well agreed.

Lo. May it please your graces to arct, for loe with postling speed
A messenger doth enter place:

King. Then will we stay to know the case.

Enter Neronis.

Nero. The mightie powers renowned Prince preserue your state for ay.

King. Messenger thou art welcomme, what hast thou to say?

Nero. Sir Clyomon your noble sonne, knight of the golden Sheeld,
Who for his valiant victories in Towne and eke in field
Is famed through the world, to your court doth now returnde,
And hath sent me before to Court, your grace for to enforme.

King. Ah messenger declare, is this of truth the which that thou hast tolde?

Nero. It is most true O Noble king, you may thereof be bold.

King. Ah ioy of ioyes surpassing all, what ioy is this to me?

My Clyomon in Court to haue, the nuptiall for to see,
Of Iuliana sister his, oh so I ioy in mind.

Queene. My boy where is thy maister speake, what is he far behind?
Declare with speed, for these my eyes do long his face to view:

Nero. Oh Queene this day he will be here, tis truth I tell to you.
But noble Queene let pardon here my bold attempt excuse,
And for to heare a simple boy in secret not refuse.

Who hath strange tidings from your sonne? I tell vnto your grace. Exit.

Lord. Behold my Lord where as I gesse, some strangers enter place:

King. I hope my Clyomon be not far, O h ioy, I see his face.

Clyo. Come Knowledge, come forward, why art thou alwaies slacke?
Get you to Court, brush vp our apparell, vntruste your packe:
Go seeke out my Page, bid him come to me with all speed you can:
Shift. Go seek out, fetch, bring here, goggs ounds, what am I, a dog or a man?
I were better be a hangman, and liue so like a drudge:
Since your new man came to you, I must packe, I must trudge.

Clyo. How stands thou knaue? why gets thou not away?

Shift. Now, now sir, you are so hastie now, I know not what to say.

Clyo. O noble Prince, the Gods aboue preserue thy roiall grace:

King. How ioyfull is my heart deare sonne, to view againe thy face?

The Historie of Chyomon

Chyomon. And I as ioyfull in the view of parents happie plight,
Whome sacred gods long tyme maintaine in honor day and night.
But this my friend O father deere, even as my selfe intreate,
Whose noblenes when time shall serue to you he shall repeate.

King. If case my sonne he be thy friend, with hart I thee imbrace :

Chyomon. With loyall hart in humble wise, I thankes your noble grace.

King. My Chyomon declare my sonne in thine aduentures late,
What hath bin wrought by fortune most to aduance thy noble state ?

Chyomon. O father, the greatest ioy of all the ioyes which was to one assynd
Since first I left your noble court by cruell fortune blind,
Is now bereft from me away, through her accursed fate,
So that I rather finde she doth envy my noble state,
Then seeke for to aduance the same, so that I boldly may
Expresse she never gaue so much, but more she tooke away.
And that which I haue lost by her, and her accursed ire,
From trauell will I neuer cease, vntill I may aspire
Vnto the view thereof oh King, wherein is all my ioy.

King. Why how hath fortune wrought to thee this care and great anoy ?

Chyomon. O father vnto me the heavenly powers assynd a noble dame,
With whome to liue in happy life, my hart did wholie frame.
But not long did that glasing starre, giue light vnto mine eyes,
But this fell fortune gins to frowne, which every state despise,
And takes away through cancred hate that happy light from me,
In which I fixed had my hope, a blessed state to see :

And daughter to the King she was, which of strange Marshes hight,
Bearing brute each where, to be darne Bewties darling bright :
Right heire vnto dame Vertues grace, dame Natures patterne true,
Dame Prudence scholler for her wite, dame Venus for her hue.

Diana for her daintie life, Susanna being sad,
Sage Saba for her sobernesse, mild Marpha being glad.
And if I should reentre make, amongst the Muses nine,
My Lady lackt no kind of art, which man may well define.
Amongst those daintie dames to be, then let all iudge that heare,
If that my cause it be not iust, for which this pensiu cheare
Fell fortune forceth me to make.

King. Yet Chyomon good counsell take.

Let

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

Let not the losse of the Lady thine so pinch thy hart with griefe;
That nothing may vnto thy mind giue comfort or relieve:
What man there Ladies are enow, although that she be gone,
Then leaue to waile the want of her, cease off to make this mone:

Chyo. No father, never seeme for to perswade, for as is said before,
What trauell I haue had for her, it shall be tryple more,
Vntill I meete with her againe.

Clamy. Well Chyomon, a while refraine,
And let me here my woes recount before your fathers grace,
But let me craue, your sister may be sent for into place.
O King youchsafe I may demand a simple bound,
Although a straunger, yet I hope such fauour may be found,
The thing is this, that you will send for Juliana hither,
Your daugheer faire, that we may talke a word or twaine together.

King. For what, let me know sir knight, do you her sight desire?

Chyo. The cause pretends no harme my Liege, why he doth this require:
King. My Lord go bid our daughter come and speake with me straight way.

Chyo. I shall my Liege in euerie point, your mind bercin obey. Exit:

Clamy. Oh father this is Clamydes, and sonne to Smasis King,
Who for my sister ventured life, the serpents head to bring:
With whom I met in trauell mine, but more whad did befall,
To worke his woe when as she comes, your grace shall know it all.

King. My sonne you are deceived much, I you assure in this,
The persona whom you tearme him for, in court alreadie is.

Clamy. No father I am not deceived, this is Clamydes sure.

King. Well my sonne do cease a while such talke to put in vre:
For loe thy sister entereth place, which soone the doubt shall end.

Clamy. Then for to shew my name to her, I surely do pretend,
My Juliana noble Dame, Clamydes do embrace,
Who many a bitter brunt hath bode, since that he saw thy face.

Enter Juliana.

Auant dissembling wretch, what credit canst thou yeeld?
Wher's the serpents head thou brought, where is my glittering Sheeld?
Tush, tush sir knight, you counterfeit, you would Clamydes be,
But want of these bewraies you quite, and shewes you are not he.

Clamy. O Princes do not me disdaine, I certaine am your knight:

The Historie of Chyomon

Julia. What art thou franticke ffolish man? auaunt from out my sight.
If thou art he, then shew my sheeld, and bring the Serpents head:

Clamy. O Princele heare me shew my case, by Fortune fell decreed.

I am your Knight, and when I had subdued the monster fell,
Through wearie fight and trauell great as Knowledge here can tell:
I laid me downe to rest a space within the Forrest, where
One Bryan than Sance soy hight, who with cowardly vsage there,
By chaunting charme, brought me a sleepe, then did he take from me
The Serpents head, my coate and sheeld, the which you gaue to me:
And left me in his prison loe, still sleeping as I was.

Loe Lady thus I lost those thinges the whiche to me you gaue,
But certainly I am your Knight, and he who did deprave
The flying Serpent of his life according as you willed,
That who so wonne your loue by him, the same should be fulfilled.

Jul. Alas poore knight, how simlie haue you framed this excuse?
The name of such a noble knight to vsurpe and eke abuse.

Clyo. No sister you are deceived, this is Clamydes sure:

Julia. No brother, then you are deceived, such tales to put in vre:
For my Clamydes is in Court, who did present to me,
In white attire the Serpents head and Sheeld, as yet to see.

Clamy. That shall I quickly vnderstand, O king permit I may
Haue conference a while with him, whom as your grace doth say,
Presents Clamydes, for to be before your royll grace:

Jul. Behold no whit agast to shew himselfe, where he doth enter place.

Cle. Aheraytot, art thou he that doth my name and state abuse?

Jul. Sir knight you are too bold in presence here, such talke against him for to vse.

Bry. Wherefore doest thou vpbraid me thus, thou varlet do declare?

Clio. No varlet he, to call him so, sit knight you are too blame:

Clamy. Wouldst thou perstand for what intent such talk I here do frame?
Because I know thou doest usurpe my state and noble name.

Bry. Who art thou, or what thy name reans were quickly make:

Clamy. I am Clamydes, whose name to beare, thou here doest vndertake.

Bry. Art thou Clamydes? vaunt thou false usurper of my state,
Auoyd this place, or death shall be thy most accursed fate.

How

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

How darest thou enterprise to take my name thus vnto thee?

Clamy. Nay rather, how darest thou attempt to vsurpe the name of me?

India. You lie Sir Knight, he doth not so, aginst him you haue it done.

Cho. Sister you are deceived, my frind here is Clamydes Prince, the King of Snamas sonne.

India. Nay Brother, neither you nor he can me deceiue herein.

Clamy. O King bowe downe thy princely eares, and listen what I say,

To proue my selfe the wight I am before your roiall grace,

And to disproue this faullesse Knight which here I find in place,

For to vsurpe my name so much, the combat will I trie:

For before I will mine honour loose, I rather chuse to die:

Ki. I like well your determined mind, but how say you sir knight?

Bryan. Nay by his ounds ile gage my gowne he dares noe fight:

By gogs bloud I shall be slaine now, if the Combat I denie,

And not for the eares of my head with him I dare trie.

King. Sir knight why do you not reanswere make in triall of your name?

Bry. I will O King, if case he dare in combat trie the same.

King. Well then go to prepare yourselues, each one his weapons take:

India. Good father let it not be so, restraine them for my sake.

I may not here behold my Knight in daunger for to be,

With such a one who doth vsurpe his name to purchase me:

I speake not this for that I feare his force or strength in fight,

But that I will not haue him deale with such a desperate wight.

King. Nay sure, there is no better way then that which is decreed,

And therefore for to end their strife the combat shall proceed:

Sir knights prepare your selues, the truth thereof to tries.

Clamy. I readie am, no cowardly heart shall cause me to denie.

Bry. Nay ile never stand the triall of it, my heart to fighte doth faint:

Therefore ile take me to my legs, seeing my honour I must attaint.

King. Why whither runs Clamydes? Sir knight seeme to stay him:

Cho. Nay it is Clamydes O King that doth fray him.

Clamy. Nay come sir come, for the combat we will trie:

Bry. Ah no my heart is done, to be Clamydes I denie.

King. Why how now Clamydes, how chance you do the combat here thus shunne?

Bry. Oh King grant pardon vnto me, the thing I haue begunne

I must denie, for I am not Clamydes, this is plaine:

Thought

The Historie of Chyomon

Though greatly to my shame, I must my words reuoke againe :
I am no other then the knight, whom they Sance Foy call,
This is Clamydes, the feare of whom, my danted mind doth pall.

Indian. Is this Clamydes? ah worthy Knight, then do forgiue thy deefe,
And welcome eke ten thousand times vnto thy Lady heere.

Clamy. Ah my Indians bright, whats past I do forgiue,
For well I see thou constant art, and whilst that I do liue,
For this, my firmed faith in thee for ever ile repose.

Indian. Of ather now I do deny that wretch, and do amongst my foes
Recount him for this treason wrought.

King. Well Knowledge, take him vnto thee, and for the small regard
The which he had to valiant Knights, this shalbe his reward,
Sith he by charmes, his cruckie in cowardly manner wrought,
On Knights, who as Clamydes did, the crowne of honour sought,
And trayterously did them betray, in prison for to keepe,
The fruits of such like cruckie, himselfe by vs shall reape :
By due desert therefore I charge to prison him conuay,
There for to lye perpetually vnto his dying day.

Bryan. Oh King be mercifull, and shew some fauour in this case :

King. Nay, never thinke that at my hands thou shalt finde any grace.
Clamydes, ah most welcome thou, our daughter to enjoy,

The heauens be praisd that this hath wrought, to foile all future noy.

Clamydes. I thanke your Grace, that you thus so well esteeme of me.

Enter Knowledge. What is all things finished, and every man eased?
Is the pageant packed vp, and all parties pleased?
Hath each Lord his Lady, and each Lady her loue?

Chyomon. Why Knowledge, what meant thou those motions to move?

Knowledge. You were best stay a while, and then you shall know,
For the Queene her selfe comes, the motion to shew.
You sent me if you remember, to seeke out your page,
But I cannot find him, I went whisling & calling through the court in such
At the last very scarcely in at a chamber I did pry, (a rage :
Where the Queene with other Ladys very busy I did spy :
Decking vp a strange Lady very gallant and gay,
To bring her here in presence, as in court I heard say.

Chyomon. A strange Lady Knowledge, of whence is she canst thou tell me?

Knowledge. Not I ant shall please you, but anon you shall see.

For

Knight of the golden Sheeld.

For lo where the Lady with your mother doth come:

Clyomon. Then straightway my duty to her grace shalbe done: The mighty Gods preferue your state, O Queene, and mother deare,

Hoping your blessing I haue had, though absent many a yeaire. (glad,

Emere Queene. My Clyomon, thy sight my son doth make thy aged mother Whose absence long and many a yeaire, hath made thy pensiuе parenes sad.

And more to let thee know my sonne, that I do loue and tender thee, I haue here for thy welcome home, a present which ile give to thee.

Clyomon. O noble Queene and mother deere, I thanke you for your great But I am otherwise bestowd, and sure I must my oath fulfill. (good will,

And so I mind if gods to fore on such decree I meane to pause, For sure I must of force deny, my noble father knowes the cause. (wene,

King. Indeed my Queene this much he told, he lou'd a Lady since he Who hath his hart and euer shall, and none but her to loue he is bent.

Clyomon. So did I say, and so I wil, no beauties blaze, no glistering wight, Can cause me to forget her loue, to whom my faith I first did plight.

Nerones. Why are you so straight lac't sir Knight, to cast a Lady off so coy? Turne once againe and looke on me, perhaps my sight may bring you ioy.

Clyo. Bring ioy to me? alas which way? no Ladies looks can make me glad:

Nero. Then were my recōpence but small, to quit my paine for you I had. Wherefore sir knight do wey my words, set not so light the loue I shew, But when you haue bethought your selfe, you wil recant and turne I know.

Queene. My Clyomon refuse her not, she is and must thy Lady be:

Clyo. If otherwise my mind be bent, I trust your grace will pardon me.

Nero. Wel then I see tis time to speake, sir knight let me one questiō crave, Say on your mind. Where is that Lady now become, to whom your plighted faith you gaue?

Clyo. Nay if I could absoluē that doubt, then were my mind at ease:

Nero. Were you not brought to health by her, whē you came sick once of Cly. Yea sure I must cōfesse a truth, she did restore my health to me, (þ feast For which good deed I rest her owne, in hope one day her face to see.

Nero. But did you not promise her to returne, to see her at a certaine day, And ere you came that to performe, the Norway King stole her away: And so your Lady there you lost:

Clyomon. All this I graunt, but to his cost. For stealing her against her will, this hand of mine bereft his life.

The Historie of Clyomon

Ne. Now sure sir knight you scud him wel, to teach him know an other m^thi
But yet once more sir Knight replie, the trut^h I crave to vnderstand; (wife:
In Forrest once, who gaue you drink, whereas you stood with sword in hād, Feareing least some had you pursude for sleying of your enemie?

Ch. That did a sillie shepheards boy, which there I tooke my Page to be.

Nero. And what is of that Page become, remains he with you, yea or no?

Ch. I sent him hither ere I came, because the King and Queene should
That I in health returned was, but since I never saw him. (know,

Ne. And sure he stands not far from hence, though now you do not know

Ch. Not far from hence, where might he be? (him,

Nero. Of trouth Sir Knight, my selfe am he:
I brought your messenger to the King, as here the Queene can testifie:
I gaue you drinke in Forrest sure, when you with drought were like to die.
I found you once vpon the shore full sick, when as you came from seas,
I brought you home to fathers Court, I sought al means your mind to please,
And this was that all this while haue waighed like a Page on thee:
Sithes hoping for to spie a time whereth^t I might discouer thee.

And so by h^tmp at last I did, I thanke your mothers noble grace:

She entreated me courteously, when I had told her all my case.

And now le^t this suffice my deare, I am Neronis whom you see,

Who many a woe^tle step hath gone, before and since I met with thee:

Ch. O sudden joye, O beatenly sight, O words more worth then gold,

Neronis, O my deare welcome, my armes I here vnfold,

To clasp thy comely corps withall, twice welcome to thy knight.

Nero. And I as joyfull am no doubt, my Clyomon of thy happie sight.

Ch. Clymonde my affured friend, lo how Dame Fortune fauoureth mee,
This is Neronis my deare loue, whose face so long I wishe to see.

Clymon. My Clyomon, I am as glad as you your selfe to see this day:

Ki. Well daughter though a stranger yet, welcome to Court as I may say.

Queen. And Lady as welcome vnto me, as if thou were mine onely child.

Nero. For this your gracious curtesie, I thanke you noble Prince mild.

Ch. Though strange and vnaquainted yet, do make account you welcome
Your nuptiall day as well as mine, I know my father will prepare. (are,

King. Yes we are prest your nuptiall day with daughter ours to see,

As well as Clymons our sonne, with this his Lady faire:

Come therefore to our Court, that we the same may soone prepare.

For we are prest throughout our land, for all our Peeres to send:
